THE EDITOR'S LETTERS

(In Random Order)

It's been a tough year for college radio. The sale of stalwart stations like KTRU, WRVU and KUSF makes us re-evaluate where college stations stand with their schools. Could your station's success lead to its dismantling? This is backward logic no doubt, but college administrators have seen the value of far-reaching stations—monetary value that is—and sold them off for multimillion-dollar returns.

I feel particularly for the students and volunteers who have logged hours of service at their stations. My volunteer job in college as music director at WMSC, a student-run, free-format 10-watter in New Jersey, was my foray into managing a staff (a role I'm currently reprising). My "office" was a former storage closet, and my cohorts were more a family than a business team. Just the same, it directly led to where I am today: at a full-time position in the independent music industry.

Countless students have or will benefit from their colleges' stations in learning production, event planning, booking, management and basic people skills. Is providing such real-world preparation not what colleges claim to do best? Is the ivory tower saying that such radio experience is a less applicable real-world skill than, say, classes in differential equations or medieval poetry?

The loss of KTRU, WRVU, KUSF and other stations is not only suffered by those who just had the rug torn out from underneath their feet but also by those who can never experience the stations as listeners, DJs or staff. Hopefully we, as a community, can protect our college stations as both independent voices and educational institutions by showing cash-strapped schools the value in retaining college radio.

BON IVER

Bon Iver JAGJAGUWAR

Toto, I've a feeling we're not in Wisconsin anymore. Bon Iver's second album features songs named after cities and provinces spread across the globe. Opener

"Perth" features distorted bass and a double-kick pedal, and on "Minnesota, WI," the limelight is shared by Vernon's voice, an acoustic guitar, a banjo, a harp, a saxophone, a pedal steel guitar and a shimmering synthesizer. Amid the experimentation on the album's taught 39 minutes, he holds fast to the trusty falsetto and vulnerable songwriting that made his debut an instant classic, but where For Emma, Forever Ago was powerful for its intimacy, Bon Iver—with its fleshed-out, full-band instrumentation—is straight-up powerful. DR

CRYSTAL ANTLERS

Two-Way Mirror RECREATION

It's been two years since Crystal Antlers' debut album, Tentacles, foretold a promising future for the Long Beach-based psychedelic band. The sophomore effort,

Two-Way Mirror, offers a two-sided take on the group's music. Half of the album features a whimsical, fanciful quality, while the other half seesaws between experimental, dreamy guitar melodies and lo-fi pop. And then there are other moments where Two-Way Mirror sounds more like the soundtrack to a Tim Burton movie than a psych-punk album. The LP lacks a consistent composition, but it definitely holds your interest as it samples different genres while stamping them with Crystal Antlers' special brand of psychedelia. KS

GARDENS AND VILLA

Gardens And Villa SECRETLY CANADIAN

Gardens And Villa's name was inspired half by the Santa Barbara street where the band members live and half by the garden that they tend in their house's backyard. Gardens And Villa takes '90s Britpop, funky bass lines and '80s synth work and then plays it all together with a sort of laid-back, coastal sangfroid. It also offers quirkiness in "Orange Blossom," a vibe-y down-tempo pop tune garnished with 16th-note runs on the wood flute. The band expends its highest energy on "Thorn Castles" and "Spacetime" before dipping on the back half into a twilit smokiness that brings the Walkmen's You And Me to mind. Unfold yourself a lawn chair and enjoy. DR

GROOMS

Prom KANINE

If its debut, Rejoicer, didn't already make it clear, Grooms is onto something unique. Centered around bandleader Travis Johnson's detuned guitar and anchored by a tremendously underrated rhythm section, the Brooklyn trio cleans up some of its raw edges for its sophomore album but keeps the signature dissonance intact. Gentler than its freakout-prone predecessor, Prom doesn't have quite as much distortion happening, though the gain still adds to the dark drama on highlights like "Into The Arms" and "Imagining The Bodies." The strange notes resonating from Johnson's Jaguar provide the most tension here, combining with tighter songwriting and clearer production to break Grooms from its influences. KM

TY SEGALL

Goodbye Bread DRAG CITY

Garage rocker Ty Segall takes it easy on Goodbye Bread, his fifth album since he began his solo career in 2008. From the opening title track's slow beat and airy mood, Segall's delivery is less agitated than on his previous albums, showing that he isn't only made up of the jagged edges that framed those works. The nine songs that follow are filled with eerie vocals and pounding drums, and even at its heaviest on "You Make The Sun Fry" and "My Head Explodes," the low-key feel is never lost. Goodbye Bread shows Segall's calmer side, but the frantic instrumentals, heavy guitar riffs and rough-around-the-fringes sound betray his decidedly harder roots. RN

Dedication 4AD

Oh, another masked dubstep producer? Not quite. Zomby, who does indeed adhere to the camera-shy ethos of his peers, traverses grime and garage lines so settled in the scene. He pooh-poohs the head-pounding wobble bass hyped by the holy pillars of "brostep" in favor of the dark garage—albeit a bit on the ravey/kuduro side—that's become the trademark of his once label, Hyperdub. Dedication, like any fine design, is intricately spliced with minimalist sounds—"Things Fall Apart," the album's only non-instrumental track, features collective animal and hypnotic choral chanter Panda Bear. WILLIAM ELLIOTT WHITMORE

Field Songs ANTI

William Elliott Whitmore takes on Americana as a singer/songwriter with the throwback voice of a late 1950s soul singer. He keeps the accompaniment to his vocal simple, building melodies with stripped-down guitar or banjo. Many of the tracks focus on the melancholy, but signs of hope spring up in the title track, "Field Song," as he tells the story of the land from which he hails. "The best of times ain't happened yet," he says as he shows you his home on a horse farm along the Mississippi River. Whitmore is a good tour guide, and though his raspy tone carries burdens, his soulful singing still manages to project warmth. SP

SHABAZZ PALACES

Black Up SUB POP

Shabazz Palaces, the project of Digable Planets member Ishmael "Butterfly" Butler, has been an enigma since it released a pair of EPs in 2009.

Butler has eschewed interviews, saying that he prefers for his music to speak for itself, and on Black Up, the venture's full-length debut, Shabazz finally speaks—in a foreign language. These are 10 tracks of heady, left-field but remarkably accessible hip-hop. Butler gets futuristic, dropping sparse, fragmented beats beneath reverb-dripping vocals, but he also leans on soul tropes and old-world melodies that sound more like they came from a Bedouin camp than from his Seattle digs. DR

COM TRUISE

Galactic Melt GHOSTLY

It would be unjust to pigeonhole Seth Haley's debut LP as chillwave. Com Truise does make electronic music with '80s-influenced production flair and loads of synthesizer work, but that's where the genre similarities trail off. Less crossover-friendly and mostly instrumental, Galactic Melt opens with the ominous grit of "Terminal" and "VHS Sex" before allowing the distinctive keyboard stabs of "Cathode Girls" to take over. Com Truise's bass throbs often hit like bombs because there's such slight instrumentation around them, and the synth lines guiding the drums through "Flightwave" bring on a feeling of weightlessness every time they drop out. KM

DJ RAFF

Latino And Proud NACIONAL

DJ Raff's debut release shies away from ordinary hip-hop hooks and thrives on elaborate electronic melodies, which are accented with bass-heavy beats. He has come a long way since his experimental homemade tapes from the early '90s, transitioning over the years into a leader of the hip-hop and b-boy culture in Santiago. The album's title—and thesis—track mixes Spanish vocals with hip-hop beats, creating a groove-filled, dance-like song that emphasizes the marriage of Latino and hip-hop with pure funk. But it's the vocal samples from artists like Maka Melendez, Piratesonic and Chico Claudio that give his music an alien, futuristic tone. SP

Waking Dreams BETWEEN WORLDS

New York vibraphonist Chris Dingman has made a name for himself as a sideman and composer, but now he's got a debut album of his own. Waking Dreams is an hour-long suite that starts with a hazy, ominous vibe but gradually opens up on the last four tracks into an atmosphere of peaceful levity. Dingman brings along a couple of buddies from his time at USC's Monk Institute Of Jazz, trumpeter Ambrose Akinmusire and bassist Joe Sanders, as well as drummer Justin Brown and pianist Fabian Almazan, who have played with Sanders since their high school days. SBTRKT finds consonance in consonants

by MARISA AVELING

Nobody knows what the vowel-less SBTRKT—pronounced “subtract”—looks like. The South London DJ/producer wears an African tribal mask whenever he performs, standing inside of a DJ booth hidden behind a stony face painted in striking colors and, depending on the mask, with long strands of taffeta streaming from the chin. It's his way of distancing his personal identity from the melodic club-oriented music that he makes. “SBTRKT is not necessarily a single artist thing,” he says via Skype from his hotel room in Arkansas. “It's more about trying to create an identity for a collective sound.” (The video function, for the record, was switched off.)

While SBTRKT's self-titled debut album was only recently released via Young Turks (the U.K. label responsible for unearthing the xx), he has been making music for the past decade, collaborating with producers like Sinden on various side projects. He found his sound after using the screamingly British genre of garage as his starting point. “It's just got so much energy and warmth and depth,” SBTRKT explains. “I just liked the space between the beats.” He saw a similar appeal in dubstep when it came along some years later, which he appreciated as an open musical grid to fill in as he pleased. “It kind of leaves more room for instrumentation or interpretation. And then when you write, you can make it musical, you can make it deep, you can make it happy, you can make it poppy, you can make it whatever. And I like that, where you've got room to move with the sound. So that's how I kind of got to [where I am] now.”

SBTRKT is an 11-track LP that takes elements of darker bass-oriented electronic music, colors it with vocals and shapes these into standalone songs with sticky hooks. Tracks like “Wildfire,” featuring the lithe voice of Little Dragon's Yukimi Nagano, push the bass wobble of dubstep into something a bit more widely palatable and use it to pad out a tune that ultimately goes pop. The song's chart friendliness has already been recognized by Drake, the pride of Canada (after Bieber, of course), who dropped in a few verses on the remix.

Nagano isn't the only one lending her humanness to the SBTRKT sound, as a number of London voices stitch together the debut album that is carried predominantly by his full-sounding production. Frequent collaborator Sampha, singer Jessie Ware and Gorillaz tour member Roses Gabor all assist in giving SBTRKT cohesiveness and longevity as a dance music album—characteristics that greatly concerned its creator. SBTRKT recounts with a laugh that the track order alone took six months of deliberation.

“Electronic music is based around this club culture and DJs who need exclusive dub plates and everything,” SBTRKT says. “Once the track comes out, within two weeks it's not fresh anymore. No one wants to hear it. They need the next new thing that a producer does. And it speeds up to this pointless thing where writing music becomes just so throwaway in electronic music. I never felt music should be like that.” •

Dale Earnhardt Jr. Jr.

Suits Up

by CHRISTINE WERTHMAN

Daniel Zott and Josh Epstein are not NASCAR junkies. They care more about baseball, specifically the Detroit Tigers, their hometown team, than they do about car racing, but they consider themselves appreciators of the sport. "It's very popular," Zott says. "You have to respect it." The casual level of their fandom may come as a surprise, considering that Zott and Epstein named their band, Dale Earnhardt Jr. Jr., after a NASCAR driver and they have willingly worn bulky, non-breathable racing suits, purchased online, at their live shows. "It's not quite flattering for our bodies, but we don't really care that much about it," says Zott. "We're not in the business of making ladies swoon," Epstein says.

But the guys are in the business of making perky, playful indie pop that is equal parts simple, two-man vocal harmonies and layered electronic-based melodies. And with this profession come the elements of performance and showmanship—and outfits. “Think about sports,” Zott says. “They don’t play in jeans. They put on their uniform. There’s a sense of pride.” The band members choose to wear the NASCAR suits as opposed to jeans and T-shirts when on stage to help them and their audiences get into the show-time headspace. “When people come out to see us, we want to perform, we want it to be like a theater show or whatever else you would take two hours out of your day and pay money to and set time aside for,” Zott says. The theatrics don’t end with the suits: Shows with Team Earnhardt also involve bubble machines, an exchange of zingers between the frontmen and the band’s name in bright lights—at least the “Jr. Jr.” part.

Zott and Epstein grew up in Michigan and now live in the suburbs of Detroit with their wives. They only met in the last couple of years, but they act like platonic life partners, finishing each others sentences and offering unsolicited compliments of each others work. Epstein, sitting on a bar stool in Brooklyn, New York’s Rock Shop, explains that, prior to forming Dale Earnhardt Jr. Jr., Zott had already “done a ton of stuff,” releasing albums as a solo artist and as a member of the band Great Fiction. Zott says that Epstein also had a fruitful pre-Dale career in a band called Silent Years. “Josh has toured a lot,” Zott says. “I have not. I’m more of a hermit.” But the guys found common ground in a love of being in the studio—and a hesitation of sharing their work with other people. “It’s hard to trust other people, and I’ve liked working by myself and controlling the whole atmosphere,” says Zott. That mentality changed when Zott and Epstein first met. “He was someone that came in and immediately there was a sense of trust.”

The two were aware of each others existence prior to meeting because they both circulated in the Detroit music community, but the spread-out, non-competitive, stylistically varied scene kept them from interacting. They finally met face to face when Zott came over to Epstein’s apartment to pick up a DVD from Epstein’s roommate. Epstein recalls Zott playing him a Great Fiction song called “Pale Ego” (“It’s an awesome song,” says Epstein. “Thank you,” says Zott.) but they only started collaborating after that initial meet-up because of a follow-up phone call. Epstein rang Zott “out of the blue, like a true gentleman,” Zott says, “and said he wanted to get together and maybe make some music.” Epstein dropped in on Zott and played him what would become the song “Simple Girl,” which turned up on the debut Dale Earnhardt Jr. Jr. EP, Horse Power, released last July on the Michigan label Quite Scientific. Epstein says that while he may have hesitated sharing his songs with others in the past, he already knew Zott’s writing and production styles going into that first session, so he was OK with letting him into his world. “I was confident going into it that I was going to let him change my music.”

Zott and Epstein kept meeting after that, working on music from 10 a.m. until 5 p.m. every day so that they could hang out with their wives at night. The hours were the most regimented thing about the partnership, which the guys viewed as a fun, collaborative experiment. Before they knew it, they had recorded enough material in Zott’s basement to make an EP, which they shared with friends. “I remember the first four people I played it for were like, ‘Holy crap, this is really good.’ And I hadn’t ever really considered it,” Epstein says. Inspired by the positive feedback, the band, dubbed Dale Earnhardt Jr. Jr. in an effort to keep things light and offer no clues as to the sound of the music, released the Horse Power EP and started playing live.

“I THINK WE BOTH BELIEVE THAT YOU DON’T HAVE TO BE REALLY SERIOUS ALL THE TIME TO MAKE SERIOUS ART.”

The group began touring the EP, which only consisted of three original songs and a cover of the Beach Boys’ “God Only Knows.” But Epstein and Zott had kept writing and recording in Zott’s basement since the release, so they were able to play about six or seven songs live in half-hour sets. Some of these shows caught the eyes of scouts for Warner Bros., who signed the band in May. “They saw us at CMJ,” Epstein says. “So CMJ, take some credit,” adds Zott.

Dale Earnhardt Jr. Jr. released its debut album, It’s A Corporate World, on June 7. The album features the three original songs from the EP, a cover of the late Gil Scott-Heron’s “We Almost Lost Detroit,” plus eight more originals. The group members did have a chance to go back and rerecord some vocals from the EP tracks before putting them on the LP, though they did not want to tinker with it too much. “You could keep changing songs for 20 years,” Zott says. “The point is, don’t do it. That was a moment. Let it happen. Let people hear it, and then move on because you’ve got to be able to create something new.”

Aside from the minor tweaks, the album, which Zott calls “A score for DIY,” reflects those basement recordings. “It’s different from my other projects because they were very serious,” Zott says. Not that the guys don’t take this Dale Earnhardt Jr. Jr. stuff seriously. “I think we both believe that you don’t have to be really serious all the time to make serious art,” says Epstein. Hours later, Zott and Epstein strip out of their NASCAR outfits on the Rock Shop stage to reveal more formal suits and ties—the guys’ new onstage uniform—underneath. But by the time they get to their encore of Steve Winwood’s “Higher Love,” you’ve learned that these guys could dress like the Grim Reaper and still show you a good time. •

liam finn FOMO

Liam Finn is back with FOMO, a pop/fuzz/funk masterpiece worthy of his pedigree. This summer he'll ride the strength of FOMO onto the festival stages of Wilco's Solid Sound and Pearl Jam 20th anniversary celebration alongside artists like The Strokes, Queens of the Stone Age and Thurston Moore. A tightly coiled 36 minutes of dreamy pop ("Neurotic World"), visceral, thumping experimental funk ("The Struggle"), near perfect studies of early 60s pop classicism ("Cold Feet") and combinations of all three, FOMO is as strong of a second album you are likely to hear this year, or any year.

"Excellent, poppy-rock-with-a-dark-soul" -Billboard

"Blends sophisticated melodies and wistful vocals with masterful authority." -SPIN

by BRENDAN MEHAN

It's Not All About THE PEE-PEE AND THE POO-POO

PS

“This sandwich kinda sucks,” says one Black Lips member to another. All four of the guys from the self-described “flower-punk” group are in rare, subdued form while sitting around a table in the upstairs seating area of a dingy, midtown Manhattan deli, the kind of place that deserved the B rating it received. The time is around 1:30 in the afternoon, but they look sleepy-eyed or maybe just a little hungover. Their voices are scratchy, making them sound like a cross between heavy smokers and little kids who just spent three hours gleefully yelling at a friend’s birthday party.

Black Lips’ raucous live shows have built it a wild and intriguing reputation in the indie music community, providing fans with a welcome escape into a beer-fueled and bodily fluid-filled world of adolescent energy. The band has spent the better part of the last decade reaching out to the farthest nether-regions of the globe, going to places where other musicians would never dream of unloading gear and plugging in, allowing that rowdy reputation to spread abroad. It has upped the offensive ante over the years, going from being referred to as a public nuisance in newspapers in its home state of Georgia to being run out of the country of India after singer and guitarist Cole Alexander’s pants and underwear mysteriously disappeared on stage.

Now, after more than 10 years making music together, the group is ready to let people know that there is more to it than just shock value. “Everyone wants to talk about the pee-pee and the poo-poo,” says guitarist Ian Saint Pé, “but how much can you talk about pee-pee and poo-poo?” “We’re grownups,” remarks Alexander. “Everybody does it.” Though most reserve it for the comfort and private of their own homes as opposed to on a stage in front of hundreds of people, Saint Pé makes a point. There is much more to the group than body discharge.

Black Lips showed signs of musical maturation this year with its June-released album and sixth studio work, Arabia Mountain. The guys brought in British producer Mark Ronson to help, marking the first time they have used a producer or really asked for any outside opinion while putting together a record. “It had to be Grammy-Award winning,” jokes Saint Pé when asked why they got more serious with this LP. The awards aren’t until early next year, but the Grammy-winning Ronson, known for producing material for the likes of Amy Winehouse, Lily Allen, Ghostface Killah, Wale, Q-Tip and others, might bring Black Lips some trophy luck.

None of the members seem at all star-struck by their work with Ronson, choosing to drop joke after joke about the producer’s successes. But their irreverent, young-at-heart attitude has always covered up how much like Southern gentlemen those involved in Black Lips actually may be. “Everyone just wants to bring up the bad things we do,” says Alexander. Through the band’s career, the members have given a fair amount back to those around them, frequently playing shows for Camelot For Kids, an organization geared toward helping out kids with autism. “Camelot For Kids holds a special place in my heart because I was in special ed. classes when I was in high school,” says Alexander. “It’s a soft spot for us really.” The group also donates a lot of money to an organization that does cochlear implants for deaf children. “We like kids,” says bassist Jared Swilley, “They’re not cowards—they’re pure.”

The group also admits to sending some money to a school in Japan after it was ravaged by the April tsunami, hoping to buy the kids some new computers for school. Where did the guys get their donation funds? “The bank? Out of pocket,” Alexander says. “When we get bigger we’ll try to step up our philanthropy.”

Not worrying about sounding cocky, Alexander promises, “if we get as big as Bono, I promise to do twice as much as what he has done for the world.”

“What’s that joke?” asks the soft-spoken drummer Joe Bradley. “Every time Bono claps his hands, a child in a third-world country dies?”

Black Lips is currently putting together a tour that will bring it through the Middle East, hopefully landing in Iraq for a show. “Things are a little fickle out there,” Alexander says sarcastically while leaning in to sip his coffee. “It’s a little flakey in the region.” The members plan to play at a university in Iraq where students apparently listen to bands like the Strokes and Yeah Yeah Yeahs, and they’ll inevitably have to tone down their live performance antics. “It’s going to be Black Lips Lite,” says Alexander. Though he insists that even a more subdued version of Black Lips is still “going to shock the shit out of them.” •

WASHED OUT RIDES THE WAVE

ERNEST GREENE survives the hype and searches 'Within'

by LUIS PAEZ-PUMAR

Ernest Greene began Washed Out as an only child, recording the project's first two EPs as singular pursuits. "They were one-off releases. Life Of Leisure was from Mexican Summer, who were great, and then the tapes from Mirror Universe for High Times," Greene says. But his musical family grew, and Greene now plays with a group, rather than by himself. The addition of band members taught him to extend songs with different arrangements and inspired him to record live drums and bass for his debut album, Within And Without.

"When I worked on the new album, I definitely kept the live show in mind more than with the first two EPs," says Greene over the phone, sounding exhausted after flying cross-country following the group's set at Sasquatch! Music Festival. "I made a conscious effort to learn more about live setups."

Now that his album is done, Greene is focusing on improving and refining his live set. The start of that was Sasquatch!, which he says did not go as well as he hoped. "We were in a covered tent, and it was really hot. The monitors weren't working, and we couldn't hear ourselves. We played most of the new stuff to get a feel for it live, but I definitely don't think that it was the best example of what we're going to be sounding like live in a month or two." One way that he hopes to improve it is by incorporating some techniques from contemporary bands, which he studied before going into the studio. "I've always been a fan of Caribou, and I think they do their live show in a really interesting way," Greene says. "I want to do stuff like that."

Washed Out falls under the polarizing "chillwave" genre, a grouping that doesn't bother Greene. "It's going to be labeled something, and I think it's definitely helped my career so far, being grouped in with a small number of artists," he says. But the labeling has also led to increased hype—and increased pressure to produce. "The kind of shitty part about it is the hype factor and how that will influence things," he says. "I felt there was some overwhelming pressure working on this record." The hype monsters weren't the only sources of Greene's stress for Within And Without, as he felt the expectations for his music rising even more after he signed to Sub Pop this April. "It's been different for this album now that I'm on Sub Pop," Greene says. "Lots more pressure to get it right, but also it's been a bit more controlled."

Greene may have felt hype and label weight, but they didn't overwhelm Within And Without, a swirly, stressless beach record, evolving from the two EPs into something more assured. Perry, GA, Greene's hometown, seems to invoke peach groves more than beaches, but Greene was always out of synch with his surroundings growing up. "When I was young, I would read blogs and research obscure producers. I was always into weirder stuff than my friends. Kind of a loner." This "loner" has stepped out of the groves and into the sand with aplomb, creating one of the first great summer records of 2011.

Greene isn't content to pause his momentum though and is already plotting his next musical moves. He is a big fan of hip-hop, and while there won't be a Washed Out Goes Rap album coming anytime soon, he does hope to use hip-hop elements on future releases. "That was something I was going for, learning how to use the low end of the super heavy bass stuff. It's really an art form, and I would love to feature more sub-y bass stuff." •

"I FELT THERE WAS SOME OVERWHELMING PRESSURE
WORKING ON THIS RECORD."

THE ARISTOCRACY OF East New York CEREBRAL BALLZY REIGNS SUPREME

by BRENDAN MEHAN

East New York's Cerebral Ballzy is like the infected wart on the androgynous ass of the current New York City synth-pop scene. Taking influence from the darker sides of the '80s (Black Flag not New Order), the five-piece of skateboarding, pizza-eating, 40-ounce-drinking and hardcore-punk-blasting dudes seems to be taking its mild amount of recent success calmly and confidently.

Before playing a show in London, Honor Titus, the group's hyper and charismatic lead singer, calls up CMJ for a quick chat, and the long-distance connection inevitably drops out. The publicist immediately rings back and apologizes. Before putting Titus back on the line, she asks, "Is it all right that he is saying a lot of this stuff?"

Titus' real-life, in-person persona is about as brash and unforgiving as the hardcore music for which his band is known. It is also just as genuine. "I'm kinda fucked up right now," he says. On what? "Let's just say alcohol," he says with a laugh. Cerebral Ballzy's self-titled debut LP, due this July on Adult Swim's Williams Street, is deeply rooted in hardcore punk from the late '70s and early '80s via Dead Boys, Circle Jerks and every other lesser or greater band that managed to spit out snarling screams and distorted guitar lines during that messy and beautiful era. Though the group acknowledges these easy comparisons, Titus describes his music in different terms. "The new album sounds like trying to do a tre flip in your garage for like three weeks," he says, "and not landing one."

Cerebral Ballzy has been around for more than three years, and like any good punk band, the group built itself by delivering hard-hitting, unforgiving live shows at any and all DIY venues it could find. Titus reflects on past shows like the one where he sprained his ankle after jumping off of an amp, the other where the guitarist almost had to have a finger amputated after a guitar string cut got infected and that time when a couple having sex in front of the stage distracted the crowd from the group's set. All standard, right? The group's secret to putting on a gnarly show, according to Titus, is "fast music, white powder and, I don't know, cheeseburgers?" He then reflects on the list he gave, starts to laugh and then backs it up, saying "We're fuckin' aristocrats, dude."

At one point, Titus suddenly cuts off the conversation by bursting into laughter. "You sound like Spencer," he says. "You ever talk to that dude?" He's talking about Spencer Pollard, the bass player from Sacramento's Trash Talk, a group that almost runs side by side with Cerebral Ballzy. Pollard was allegedly stabbed by a white supremacist this past spring. "He's OK, he's OK," Titus reassures. "He's a fucking G. I think he still whopped all their asses."

Cerebral Ballzy has received a lot of attention for being interracial, and Titus enters a somber mood when asked if the band has ever dealt with racial issues itself. "I guess it depends on what the word 'issue' entails," he says. "A lot of people think we're big just because we're multiracial and that makes us gimmicky." Titus has been asked enough questions about race in his interview lifetime for now, and he would rather talk about something else, like his tattoos, one being a "cat wearing a jacket" and another being "a chick showing her tits." To Titus, the role of race in his group is as inconsequential as the expiration date on the bottom of the 40 ounce he buys at the bodega. "Whatever man," he says. "We're not sweating anything. We're just skating and drinking and making our music." •

POP Radica JOHN MAUS

Disrupts
THE REGIME OF THE SENSIBLE

by KODI MCKINNEY

John Maus is standing in Manhattan's expertly decorated, businessmen-filled Eventi Hotel wearing a loose-fitting parka in the middle of May. He's fresh from a headlining performance at Brooklyn's Glasslands Gallery the night before, leading up to a full summer tour. The show "was OK," he says. "I didn't feel like I had enough energy, you know what I mean?" It's hard to imagine him ever running short on energy, as he bursts with manic inspiration among the stoic capitalists nearby, ideas and opinions spilling out of his mouth almost faster than he can articulate them.

Maus is clearly possessed with a considerable intellect, which aids him both as a musician and as an academic. Born in Austin, MN, he studied music composition at the California Institute Of The Arts under such avant-garde luminaries as Morton Subotnick and James Tenney. Since then, he's become a Ph.D. candidate and instructor of political philosophy at the University Of Hawaii At Manoa, financing his coursework and touring by a stipend. And his first new album in four years, We Must Become The Pitiless Censors Of Ourselves, builds a potential breakout release on the boundary-pushing synth-pop he's become known for while hinting at a tricky philosophy lesson within its title.

"That comes from this philosopher that I was really interested in," Maus says. "So everything you know—consume, communicate and enjoy—that's kind of what the world says, right? All art and all thought is ruined if we just give over to that. We've got to struggle to try and interrupt that somehow with something else, you know?" That creative philosophy carries over to Maus' mindset as a musician. "It maybe sounds ridiculous or whatever, but I've always kind of suspected that there's something radical about pop, there's something aggressively disruptive about degenerate punk rock," he says. "I think all art in a sense, if it's genuine, disrupts the regime of the sensible."

"I spend most of my time at a keyboard noodling around looking for some kind of surprise."

Maus and certain allies of his have been disrupting musical sensibilities for several years, largely by experimenting with the limitations of pop structure. He's played live keyboards for Ariel Pink, no stranger to confronting his audiences on record or in person, and he's also played with Panda Bear, perpetually growing with and outside of Animal Collective as a whole wave of indie musicians struggle to catch up. Alone, Maus creates music that reflects the wild intelligence driving him, often invoking odd lyrical mantras; the new album's "Cop Killer" repeats lines from the Body Count song, a reinterpretation that Maus says is about "the police in our head." His solo work also shows an obvious fondness for the electronic sounds of the 1980s. Though where any nostalgia is concerned, he is vocal about his intent to do more than adopt an old fashion.

"Where I'm coming from or what I'm thinking about isn't so much about nostalgia or some idea of retro," he says. "It's about these possibilities that have already been opened up in the kind of popular music tradition." For Maus, this includes the use of synthesizers and harmonics that sound distinctly '80s but still hold relevance decades later. "These things still live today and still speak today, and sometimes the work necessitates their mobilization."

Maus' inspiration does not end with the 1980s, as he's immersed himself in works stemming from the German Romantic tradition, the Medieval and Renaissance periods, and classical music. He appreciates these other historical forms, but unlike those of the '80s, Maus recognizes an inherent weakness in trying to work them into today's pop conventions. "That's what's interesting about these older languages, like Mozart and Haydn and stuff. You can't really because it's a tonal language, because we no longer have the dimensions of thematic development or tonality in the sense of a whole symphony that's about a journey from C minor to C major. We don't listen to that dimension of it anymore," Maus says. But if you are going to cop styles from those times, "you're going to have to be more on the abstract."

The deceptive simplicity of Maus' approach to songwriting—"I just spend most of my time at a keyboard just noodling around looking for some kind of surprise"—underscores We Must Become The Pitiless Censors Of Ourselves, which shows Maus both at his most anthemic on songs like "Believer" and at his greatest state of compositional unity between pop songcraft and experimental influences. It's his strongest record yet, and maybe it's because he's mastering ways to blur the lines of what a pop song is. "I think there's definitely conventions to popular music, like a periodic rhythm would definitely be one," he says. "Maybe it's our task to wrest the radical from the periodic." •
