REZILLOS: 35 DATES

FOLLOWING THE chart success of their album "Can't Stand The Rezillos", the Scottish band are embarking on a massive tour, which starts in a fortnight's time and runs through until two days before Christmas. Comprising 35 dates, it's the longest tour they've ever undertaken, and they're supported throughout by four-piece Irish band The Undertones — who are label-mates of The Rezillos on Sire Records, with their debut single "Teenage Kicks" currently knocking on the chart door.

And The Rezillos themselves have a new single coming out early next month as their follow-up to "Top Of The Pops". It is one of their most requested stage numbers "Destination Venus", coupled with a new song called "Mystery Action", both titles composed by guitarist John Callis.

Tour dates are Leicester University (November 11), Canterbury Odeon (14), Reading Top Rank (15), Plymouth Metro (16), Cardiff University (17), Southampton University (18), Bristol Locarno (19), Blackburn King George's Hall (21), Sheffield Polytechnic (22), Lancaster University (24), Bradford University (25), Redcar Coatham Bowl (26), Fife St. Andrew's University (27), Coventry Warwick University (29), Newcastle City Hall (30), Manchester Free Trade Hall (December 1), two shows at Liverpool Eric's (2), London Strand Lyceum (3), Birmingham Town Hall (4), Keele University (5), Malvern Winter Gardens (6), Bournemouth Village Bowl (7), Brighton Sussex University (8), Colchester Essex University (9), Croydon Greyhound (10), Dublin McGonagles (12), Belfast The Point (13 and 14), Portrush Arcadia (15), Falkirk Maniqui (18), Aberdeen Fusion Ballroom (19), Dundee Samanika's (20), Inverness Strathpeffer Pavilion (21), Edinburgh Odeon (22) and Glasgow Apollo (23).

For the whole of the tour, the two bands will be travelling the country by bus. All tickets are on sale now — for London Lyceum they are priced £2.50; at Manchester, Birmingham and Newcastle they are £2.50, £2 and £1.50; and elsewhere they vary, so readers are advised to check with the respective box-offices.

Clash in wrangle with ex-manager

THE CLASH confirmed this week that they've parted company with their manager Bernard Rhodes. He is seeking to freeze all the band's earnings and has instituted High Court proceedings, which they intend to resist strenuously, alleging that "financial accounting by the management is disastrous". The case was being heard in the Chancery Division on Tuesday.

There have been several changes in The Clash's tour itinerary, reported last week. They now play Bournemouth Village Bowl on November 22 instead of (9), Manchester Apollo on November 23 instead of Belle Vue on the 15th, Coventry Locarno on 28 instead of 14, and Newcastle Polytechnic on December 2 instead of 3. Malvern Winter Gardens (November 10), Birmingham Odeon (22) and Ipswich Gaumont (23) are cancelled, and their Liverpool gig — originally planned for December 1 — is now set for the city's University on December 6.

There are new bookings at Edinburgh Odeon (December 3) and Bath Pavilion (12). London and Birmingham dates, as well as support bands, will be announced next week. Finally, release of their new CBS single "Tommy Gun" is delayed until November 24, though their new album "Give 'Em Enough Rope" still comes out on November 10.

Shirts, Johansen visits

The Shirts' ANNIE GOLDEN in action

THE SHIRTS are now confirmed for a short British tour next month, as exclusively forecast by NME two weeks ago. They'll be here for about ten days, and so far eight gigs have been set for them — at Liverpool Eric's (November 10), Manchester University (11), Birmingham Barbarella's (12), Bristol Locarno (14), Newcastle University (15), Bailey Crumpton (16), Sheffield Polytechnic (17) and London Camden Music Machine (18). To tie in with their visit, Harvest Records are releasing a new single by the band titled "Lonely Android", taken from their debut album "The Shirts".

NEWS DESK

THE BOYFRIENDS and a girlfriend

Boyfriends for extensive tour

THE BOYFRIENDS go back on the road next weekend for an extensive tour, running into December. It ties in with the November 17 release of their new United Artists single "Last Bus Home", one of their firm stage favourites.

A novelty throughout the tour will be the appearance of The Backbeats as "support" act — because, as their followers will know, these are The Boyfriends themselves performing 60's-style material. Dates confirmed are:

Hatfield Polytechnic (November 3), Nottingham Trent Polytechnic (7), Bristol Brunel

Technical College (11), Sheffield Polytechnic (14), Bradford College of Education (15), London City University (17), Reading Bulmershe College (18), Torquay 400 Club (21), Southampton University (22), Basingstoke Technical College (23), Liverpool Polytechnic (24), Manchester UMIST (25), Huddersfield Polytechnic (28), Newcastle University (29), Leeds Fan Club (30), London Strand King's College (December 4), Blackburn Technical College (7), Oxford Westminster College (8) and London Kensington Nashville (9). A few more gigs are likely to be added.

NEWS WAVES

● 999 will be supported by Chelsea, John Cooper-Clarke and Salford Jets, when they climax their current tour at London Strand Lyceum on Sunday, November 5. They then leave for a five-country European tour.

● PERE UBU have added another two dates to their upcoming U.K. tour, at Portsmouth Polytechnic (November 30) and Brighton Sussex University (December 1). But they have cancelled Doncaster Outlook on December 4, as the venue is closing down. Their itinerary now consists of 20 gigs.

● THE SMIRKS are putting together a string of concerts for early December at schools and youth clubs in the Manchester area, while further nationwide dates are planned for early in the New Year.

● THE EDGE, the band launched by two former Damned members, add Stafford North Staffs Polytechnic (November 3) and Cranfield Technical College (9) to their current debut tour.

● THE PLEASERS have added three last-minute Scottish dates to their current tour — at Ayr Caledonian Hotel (tonight, Thursday), Edinburgh University (Friday) and Glasgow University (Saturday).

● CIMARONS, one of Britain's most consistent reggae bands, will be special guests on Sham 69's previously reported "Guy Fawkes Memory" tour opening in Edinburgh on November 1 ... and Newcastle Polytechnic have cancelled Sham's scheduled appearance on November 4 for what they describe as reasons beyond their control.

● THE RADIATORS play their only London date this year next Tuesday (31) at Camden Electric Ballroom, supported by Stiff Little Fingers. It's their first gig without the "From Space" tag, and it introduces their new guitarist Bill Morley.

● THE DOGS DOE, the Los Angeles-based band who originally stemmed from Detroit, arrive in Britain next month for their first tour here. First confirmed dates are York Pop Club (November 22), London Camden Music Machine (29) and London Islington Hope and Anchor (December 1). A maxi-single called "Fed Up" is being released to coincide with the gigs by the band who comprise Lauren Molinaire (lead guitar and vocals), Mary Kay (bass and vocals) and Ron Wood (drums).

X-RAY GIGS & NEW LP

X-RAY SPEX are back in action again after their long summer lay-off, due initially to Poly Styrene's illness and subsequently to recording commitments. Their long-awaited debut album is at last set for release, and in the middle of next month they begin a short series of major dates, including a London concert.

They play Liverpool Eric's (November 17), Glasgow Queen Margaret's Union (18), Bristol Tiffany's (23), Cambridge Corn Exchange (24), London HammerSmith Odeon (27), Manchester Apollo (29) and Birmingham Odeon (December 10).

Support act on the first two shows is The Invaders, with The Members taking over for the next two. Appearing on the last three dates are Sore Throat and poet Martin Mighty Mouth, with The Invaders also on the bill at HammerSmith. Promoter is John Giddings of the MAM Organisation, who says there's a possibility of a couple of college dates being added to this schedule. Admission prices vary from one venue to another but at HammerSmith they are £3, £2.50, £2 and £1.50.

X-Ray's album, rushed out by EMI on November 18, is called "Germ Free Adolescence" — which is also the title of their previously-reported single, released this weekend. The LP's title track is a different version from the one issued as a single, and the LP also contains several favourite items from the band's repertoire as well as new Styrene material.

Spex also appear in BBC-2's "Old Grey Whistle Test" on Tuesday, December 5.

Producer IAN HUNTER with Gen X's BILLY IDOL

GENERATION X, who've been conspicuous by their absence during the past few months, are poised to bounce back in style — by way of a major tour and their long-awaited second album. Most of their gigs are still being confirmed, but it's known that the tour kicks off at High Wycombe Town Hall on November 24, and finishes with two shows at Liverpool Eric's on December 16.

The rest of their schedule, including dates in Scotland and Ulster, will be announced in a week or two. And of course, they are already set for a show with The Jam at London Wembley Arena on November 29, as part of the six-day Great British Music Festival at that venue. The new album, tentatively titled "Intercourse (Old Meets New)", was produced by Ian Hunter and is planned for late November release by Chrysalis.

Gloria Mundi in action

GLORIA MUNDI, whose new single "Glory Of The World" is issued by RCA this week, are playing a short series of dates next month — their first since they acquired two new members, guitarist Ellis and bassist Nigel Ross-Scott. They visit York Pop Club (November 8), Nottingham Sandpiper (10), Manchester Mayflower (11), Bradford Royal Standard Hotel (12), Leeds Fan Club (14), London Marquee (16), Birmingham Barbarella's (17) and Middlesbrough Rock Garden (18).

Parliament, Hayes extra gigs SMOKEY MAKES IT!

SMOKEY ROBINSON duly arrived in Britain this week, so dispelling doubts — reported by NME last week — about his projected tour. This means that his two concerts at the London Palladium on November 6 and 7 are now officially confirmed, and he's also appearing at Leicester Bailey's (all this week), Watford Bailey's (all next week), Plymouth Top Rank (November 8) and Poole Arts Centre (9). He then flies to Spain for several dates, before returning to film a TV show.

The Jamaican stalwart is accompanied by his seven-piece band and two-girl back-up vocalists, collectively known as the Quiet Storm Orchestra. And to tie in with his visit, Motown release his single "Shoe Soul" on November 3 — it's taken from his current album "Love Breeze". The last time Robinson was here was just a year ago, when he sold out two nights at London Hammersmith Odeon.

THE PARLIAMENT/FUNKADILLIC revue is to play an extra London concert at the Hammersmith Odeon on Thursday, December 14, at 8pm. This has been slotted in because their original three nights at this venue (11-13) sold out almost immediately in what promoters Straight Music say is the heaviest ticket demand the Hammersmith Odeon has experienced in years. Tickets for the additional show go on sale tomorrow (Friday) priced £4, £3.50, £3 and £2.50.

ISAAC HAYES has added three more dates to his British tour itinerary, reported two weeks ago. They are at Dunstable (November 2), Blackpool Tiffany's (3) and two performances at Liverpool Empire (4). As with his other dates, these gigs feature the full Isaac Hayes Revue, plus Edwin Starr and his backing band — a grand total of over 50 singers and musicians.

ESTHER PHILLIPS flies into Britain next month, as part of a whirlwind European tour. She's playing only one concert in this country, and it's at London Kingsway Royal Theatre on Sunday, November 19. Tickets are now on sale priced £5, £4, £3, and £2.

DUANE EDDY is returning to Britain to appear as special guest on the previously reported major concerts by Jerry Lee Lewis next month. The rock'n'roll guitar star can be seen with Lewis in two shows at London Rainbow (November 19) and another two at Birmingham Odeon (20).

CRYSTAL GAYLE is being set up for a headlining concert series in the early spring, a United Artists spokesman confirmed this week. She hasn't been able to visit Britain this year because of heavy U.S. commitments, coupled with her mother's illness. But details of her 1979 tour can't be expected shortly.

Concerts set by Showaddywaddy

SHOWADDYWADDY are set for a string of dates before Christmas, to promote their current Arista single "Pretty Little Angel Eyes". Already confirmed for the Royal Variety Performance at the London Palladium (November 13) and a headlining concert at London Rainbow (17), they also play Bristol Colston Hall (November 5), Farnworth Blighy's (8-11), Oxford New Theatre (16), Bournemouth Garden Row (18), Derby Assembly Rooms (20), Coventry Theatre (December 1), Manchester Apollo (2), Sunderland Empire (3), Middlesbrough Town Hall (4), Sheffield City Hall (7), Hanley Victoria Hall (8), Preston Guildhall (15), Halifax Civic Theatre (16), Harrogate Royal Hall (17), Birmingham Odeon (18) and Leicester De Montfort Hall (19).

Donegan's back

LONNIE DONEGAN, the former king of skiffle, starts a major British tour next week to tie in with the November 10 release of his new Chrysalis album "Senddown". He plays Nottingham Theatre Royal (October 30-November 4), Ipswich Gaumont (7-8), Taunton Odeon (9-10), Southampton Gaumont (11), Manchester Opera House (13-18), Coventry Theatre (20-25), Aberdeen Capitol (27-December 1), Hanley Odeon (4-6), Liverpool Empire (7-8) and Doncaster Gaumont (9).

JOHNNY CASH: MARCH DATES

JOHNNY CASH returns to Britain at the tail end of the winter, to play his first concerts here for more than four years. He's accompanied by his wife, June Carter, plus The Carter Family and The Tennessee Three.

Dates for The Johnny Cash Show are Brighton Centre (March 11), London Wembley Conference Centre (13, 14, 15 and 16, with two shows on the last day), Birmingham National Exhibition Centre (17), two shows at Manchester Apollo (18) and two at Glasgow Apollo (20).

Wembley tickets are priced £8, £7 and £6, while elsewhere they are £7, £6 and £5. Postal bookings are being accepted now, and they should be sent to the venues concerned — except for the Birmingham gig, where they should be addressed to "The Johnny Cash Show" (to whom cheques should be made payable).

E.B.S., 6th Floor, Radnor House, 93-97 Regent Street, London, W.1 Box-office opening dates for personal callers will be announced shortly

OFF THE RECORD

The 'alternative hits' compilation

POLYDOR are putting out an "alternative hits" collection next month, featuring a clutch of leading new-wave acts and retailing at £4.35. Titled "Twenty Of Another Kind", it includes such Polydor bands as The Jam, Sham 69, John Otway & Wild Willy Barrett, The Jollies, The Heartbreakers and Siouxsie & The Heartbreakers. There are also various other acts not signed to Polydor, but appearing in this compilation under special licence — among them are The Stranglers, 999, Generation X, The Adverts, The Skids, The Lurkers, and The Boys.

BLONDIE have a new single released by Chrysalis tomorrow (Friday). Taken from their current hit album "Parallel Lines", it features "Hanging On The Telephone" and "Will Anything Happen". And a limited edition of 10,000 copies of "Parallel Lines", pressed in picture-disc form with Debbie Harry imprinted in the grooves, is being imported from the States — price is £7.99 and they'll be available from next week.

To coincide with James Brown's previously-reported British tour next month, Polydor issue his new single "Nature — Parts I and II" on November 10.

BBC Records this week release a compilation double set titled "America's Greatest Hits", retailing at £4.95. It features 25 tracks from the last 20 years, and among artists included are Bill Haley, Fats Domino, Everly Brothers, Jerry Lee Lewis, Beach Boys, Supremes, Aretha Franklin, Mamas and The Papas, The Jacksons and The Carpenters.

Release of Kate Bush's new EMI single, originally announced as this weekend, has been put back until November 3.

Release of the new Diana Ross album, simply titled "Rox", has been delayed by production difficulties at the pressing plant. But Motown now hope to have it in the shops by this weekend.

Yachts have their second Radar single issued on November 3, comprising "Yachting Types" and "Hypnotising Lies", both penned by keyboards player and vocalist Henry Priestman. The band's gig at London Kensington Nashville on November 2, the last in their current tour, is being recorded for subsequent release.

Five-piece band Knowledge are the first reggae signing to the A & M label, who release their debut album this week, with their name as its title. They are planning their first British tour in the New Year.

A single called "Three Hippies In A Gas Chamber" by High Society comes out this weekend on the band's own AFC label.

WEA have signed singer-composer Tony Esoria, formerly of The Casuals, to a worldwide recording deal. He is currently completing his first album, for release before Christmas.

Steppin' Out, who were signed by Charly Records in the summer, have their debut single out on November 17 — pressed in 12-inch red vinyl, it's called "Who's To Know". The band, now augmented to a five-piece, have their first album "Steppin' Out" issued on December 8.

The Monochrome Set go into the studios next month to record their debut single for Rough Trade Records. It's being produced by Mayo Thompson of Red Crayola.

The five new albums by the various members of the current "Be Stiff" package tour, all originally pressed in different colours, have now additionally been made available in orthodox black vinyl. Stiff Records say they've found a lot of people believe that normal black sounds better than coloured vinyl. Artists concerned are Wreckless Eric, Lene Lovich, Rachel Sweet, Jona Lewie and Mickey Jupp.

Warner Brothers are putting out a limited edition six-record boxed set by near-legendary jazz saxist Charlie Parker. The material is culled from the Dial catalogue, vintage 1945-48, and only 4,000 hand-numbered sets are available. Price is £25.

Charisma have signed a new four-piece London band called The Dazzlers, whose debut single comes out this week in what's described as a "special optical bag".

RICHARDS OFF THE HOOK

KEITH RICHARDS was given a year's probation by a Toronto court on Tuesday for the possession of heroin. And this now means The Rolling Stones' plans to play UK concerts early next year are no longer in jeopardy. Richards had pleaded guilty to possessing 22 grams of heroin worth about £2,000, found when Mounties raided his Canadian hotel room in February 1977.

The prosecution had hoped for a six to 12 month jail sentence for the guitarist. But the defence for Richards, who'd faced life imprisonment on a trafficking charge until it was dropped earlier this week, argued that he needed at least another six months medical treatment to kick his addiction.

Plans for a Stones tour were going ahead even before Richards was sentenced. Visiting London last week, Mick Jagger said they'll play Australia soon after Christmas.

"And when we're finished there, then it's the UK," he added.

Even so, Jagger is relieved Richards is not going down. The group's British press agent Keith Altham said that Richards has already been invited to play a charity show in Canada.

"Mick says he's very pleased," Altham laughed, "and he thinks Keith will be excellent on his own."

Miller's new band on tour

THE NEW 1978 version of Frankie Miller's Full House set out early next month on a major British tour, lasting over five weeks and taking in 31 dates. These will be the first gigs for the new band which now comprises ex-Meat Ticket sideman Steve Simpson and Ed Dean (both on guitar), and two former Ace members, Tex Comer (bass) and Fran Byrne (drums).

With his new Chrysalis single "Darlin'" climbing the charts, Miller is currently recording an album with producer Dave Mackay for New Year release. As already reported, the band are set for an appearance in the six-day Great British Music Festival at Wembley Arena on November 30, and other confirmed dates are:

Newcastle Mayfair (November 10), Rochdale Champions Hall (11), Redcar Connaught Bowl (12), Nottingham Trent Polytechnic (13), Aberdeen Ruffles (15), Glasgow City Hall (16), Edinburgh University (17), Dundee University (18), Dumfries Stagecoach (19), Sheffield University (21), Keele University (22), Hull University (23), Huddersfield Polytechnic (24), Birmingham University (25), Mather Winter Gardens (29), Salford University (December 1), Doncaster Bircotes Leisure Centre (2), Blackburn King George's Hall (3), Plymouth Metro (5), Cardiff University (6), Swansea Nat Club (7), Leicester Polytechnic (8), Slough College (9), Poole Wessex Concert Hall (11), Canterbury Odeon (13), Bristol Brunel Technical College (14), Birmingham Barbarella's (15), Cromer West Rurton Pavilion (16) and Croydon Greyhound (17).

This Week's News Round-Up

THE REAL THING

THE REAL THING who support David Essex in his five concerts in late November and early December, are also on tour in their own right. They promote their new album "Step Into Our World", issued by Pye this weekend, at Salford Spa Pavilion (tonight, Thursday), Newcastle Mayfair (Friday), Walsall Town Hall (Saturday), Salford Wilmslow Centre (Sunday), Northampton Saloon (November 11), Crawley Sports Centre (13), Hayes Alfred Best Centre (14), Maresfield White Horse (15), Hull New (16), Whitehaven Civic (18), Winsted Civic (19), Bradford St. George's Hall (10), Manchester Playhouse (11), Stockton Fiest (13), Swansea Top Rank (14), Doncaster Rotters (15), Aylesbury Civic (17), Swindon Oasis (18), Blatchley Leisure Centre (19), Sheffield Top Rank (20), Derby Tiffany's (23), Reading University (24), Cleethorpes Bunnies (December 3), Leicester Granby Hall (14), Southend Cliffs Pavilion (15), Walsingham Isle of Ely College (16), Plymouth Fiesta (7) and Porthcawl Stoneleigh Club (10).

THE CRUISERS

THE CRUISERS, London duo-wap band following in the footsteps of Showaddywaddy and Darts, are this week joined by ex-Racing Cars drummer Steve Bull who replaces Steve Murray in the line-up. They gig at Newcastle Dolce Vita (this Thursday for three days), Leeds Gaisty (Sunday), Cambridge Grenadier (November 3), Dudley J.B.'s (4), Wolverhampton Lafayette (10), Bristol Polytechnic (11), Newport Village (17), Loughborough Town Hall (18), Hull Telstar (19), Benilton Double Six (24), Manchester Polytechnic (30), Leicester University (December 6), London Ealing College (12) and Bristol Granary (30). New Year dates in both Britain and Europe are being lined up to tie in with the release of their debut album and single.

Jean Pierre Bouchard-Rees

In our issue of September 16, 1978, we reported that Warren Harry had sacked Jean Pierre Bouchard-Rees and Paul Hemmings. This was printed in good faith based upon information received. We are now assured that it was false, and we apologise to Mr. Bouchard-Rees and Mr. Hemmings for any embarrassment caused to them.

GILLAN (that's the Ian Gillan band) return from their current Japanese visit early next month, and play a short series of dates before setting off for America. The first three set are Fife St. Andrew's University (November 9), Manchester Mayflower (9) and Preston Guildhall (15). They'll also be appearing in Belfast (12) and Swansea (16), but venues haven't yet been confirmed.

AFTER THE FIRE are lining up another string of gigs for December. So far set are Liverpool Polytechnic (1), Reading University (6), Chelmsford City Tavern (7), Molebrook Pavilion (8), Leeds Staging Post (9), London Blackheath Blueshirts Club (12), Lincoln A.J.'s (14), Sundeland Mecca (15), Middlesbrough Rock Garden (16) and Sheffield Limit Club (23).

HEINZ, British rock star of the so-called Golden Era, returns to the scene as front man of a new rock 'n' roll act that's shortly going on the road. As yet unnamed, it also features Earl Sherrard, ex-Gene Vincent guitarist Leighon Hye and The Housekeepers band. They're being handled by Tony Groves at Backstage Management (01-675 1374).

TONY MCPHEE and his band Terephane go back on the road to headline a five-week pre-Christmas college and club tour. It opens at Warrington Lion Hotel on November 4 and finishes at London Woolwich Tramshed on December 12. Only other venue so far confirmed is Chester Smarties on November 7.

THIRD WORLD have added another date to their current tour — it's a late booking at Cromer West Rurton Pavilion tomorrow (Friday). And their show at Lancaster University is put back one week from November 12 to 19.

WHIRLWIND are going to play a series of free lunchtime gigs in London during the coming week. They'll be appearing at the Notre Dame Hall in Leicester Square daily from tomorrow (Friday) until next Wednesday (November 1), between noon and 2 pm each day. Various disc-jockeys will also be taking part.

ALAN PRICE plays a one-off concert at London Drury Lane Theatre Royal on Sunday, November 19. It's promoted by John Martin in conjunction with Capital Radio, who are recording it for subsequent broadcast. Tickets are now on sale priced £3.50, £3, £2.50 and £1.50.

FABULOUS POODLES have added another couple of dates to their current tour — at Bath University (this Saturday) and Scunthorpe Tiffany's. And their gig on November 11, previously planned for Manchester University, is switched to Coventry Warwick University.

LONDON's Duke Of York Theatre has been purchased by Capital Radio. One of the terms of the deal is that the venue, built in 1892, shall be thoroughly renovated. Thereafter it will continue mainly to present plays, but Capital's involvement means that it will also emerge as a new London venue for concerts.

THE TEN-DAY rock festival at Fife St. Andrew's University, reported three weeks ago, has added Gillan (November 8) and Head (9) to its line-up. And Five Hand Reel now appear on November 11 instead of Sonja Kristina's Escape. Other acts already set include Whirlwind (3), Wilko Johnson (8), The Jam (7) and Crazy Caven (10).

RONNIE HAWKINS' headlining gig in the London rock 'n' roll festival at Harlesden Roxy Theatre on November 11 (reported last week) will offer a special bonus to the audience. A contest is being held in which the prize is a free trip to America next year. It will be aboard the Rock Ark, a two-week tour being organised by GMC Promotions, who have already hired a 388-seater jumbo to cope with the ticket demand.

RICHARD & LINDA

RICHARD & LINDA THOMPSON begin their autumn tour next weekend, following the release of their new Chrysalis album "First Light". Highlight of their itinerary is a major London concert at Drury Lane Theatre Royal on Sunday, November 12. A number of dates are still being finalised and will be announced shortly, but those confirmed so far are Salford University (November 3), Cambridge Lady Mitchell Hall (6), Wolverhampton Polytechnic (8), Basildon Towngate Theatre (10), Plymouth Woods Centre (13), Penzance The Garden (14), Exeter Routes (15), Huddersfield Polytechnic (17), Leicester University (18) and Sheffield Polytechnic (19).

STADIUM DOGS

STADIUM DOGS, the Swindon-based band recently signed by Magnet Records, have their debut album "What's Next" issued on November 10 — and it's preceded by their single "Loves On The Airwaves" on November 3. To tie in with these releases, they undertake their first UK tour, visiting Norwich Boogie House (November 10), Bishopsgate Stortford Triad Leisure Centre (15), Nottingham Sandpiper (17), Sheffield Limit Club (20), London Harrow Rd. Windsor Castle (21 and 28), Manchester University (22), Scarborough Penhouse (24), Birmingham Barbarella's (25), Leeds Floor Garden Hotel (26), Warrington Carlton Club (27), Leeds University (29) and Keele University (30).

DAVE LEWIS BAND

DAVE LEWIS BAND, who recently completed a series of concerts supporting the Climax Blues Band, go on the road next month in their own right. Dates so far confirmed are Bristol Granary (November 2), London Marquee (3), Birmingham University (4), London Finchley Torrington (15), London Camden Music Machine (8), Leeds Floor Green Hotel (10), Bedford College of Education (11), Swansea Circles Club (16), Burton 76 Club (17), Baffey Crumplets (23), Dudley J.B.'s (24), Nottingham Boot Club (25) and Newbridge Club & Institute (26).

SQUEEZE

SQUEEZE, who've just finished an extensive tour with Dr. Feelgood, headline their own British dates next month. And their new single "Goodbye Girl" is released by A & M on November 3, the first 10,000 copies being marketed in "a unique three-dimensional sculptured" sleeve. They play Manchester University on November 8 then, after supporting Ed Shearman & The Four Roads in their three Scottish gigs (reported last week), they continue with their own tour at Doncaster Outlook (13), Birmingham Barbarella's (14), Norwich Boogie House (15), Preston Polytechnic (17), Plymouth Woods Centre (20), Penzance The Garden (21), Exeter Routes (22), Bournemouth Village Book (23), Bath Pavilion (25), Leeds Fan Club (28) and York Revolution (29). Then then go into the studios to complete their new album, planned for New Year release.

Who ever thought of the Japanese as innovators?

Imitators yes.

But innovators?

True they make reliable cars, excellent cameras and outstanding hi-fi equipment.

But what genuinely great inventions have they been responsible for?

Modestly, our chairman would have replied, "I am not a great inventor."

"In my field I have merely made improvements."

His field was high-fidelity tape recorders.

He built the first four-track stereo tape machine with a synchronous main motor. The speed remains constant, even during fluctuations in the power supply.

He developed a new kind of oil-retaining metal for the bearings in his motors, eliminating the need for constant servicing.

He was the first to install three separate motors in a cassette deck. Something acknowledged to be ideal, but until then thought to be impossible.

And concerned that his machines should not only reproduce the purest possible sound, but should also last indefinitely, he finally invented his masterpiece.

He took the ferrite from within platinum. Tempered and polished it to a jewelled finish. And cut it to form a tape head that compared to conventional tape heads lasts a hundred times longer.

He called it quite simply the Akai GX head.

And throughout his philosophy was equally simple. "Have responsibility for and pride in what you make."

It remains the Akai motto to this day.

THE FIRST DATSUN: A COPY.

THE FIRST GLASS FERRITE TAPE HEAD: AN ORIGINAL.

Strange Daze In Sheffield (Or Maybe Halifax)

THE LURKERS and PAUL MORLEY fail to communicate over a soggy cheese sandwich.

SOMEONE MUST have been spreading lies about me, for without doing anything wrong I was told to write a feature about The Lurkers. The Man did not notice any discrepancy between my agreement and true revulsion.

(When I sat opposite a member of The Lurkers in a forboding, mucky cafe fingering a spongy cheese sandwich and silently complaining about the weakness of the tea the member astutely perceived my reluctance. "You picked the short straw," he sardonically asked.

The assignment: travelling with the group for a couple of days, visiting Halifax and Sheffield, determining the group's destiny, communicating with the four musicians, appreciating the rigours and uniqueness of Life On The Road.

The bite to the article was to be an objective appraisal of youth leisure life and the 'excitement' groups like The Lurkers bring into the monotonous existence of working class teenagers.

The sting was to be a convincing criticism of The Lurkers' particular worldview balanced with the theory that the only true creatives are those who inspire others to create — and surely The Lurkers inspire more than, say, Brotherhood of Man or Pere Ubu?

But when the Big Day arrived circumstances had changed. The Lurkers' extensive nationwide tour had been ruptured by clumsy organisation. A once (full) 14-day part of the tour had dwindled right down to one day. A large part of the original concept for the article fluttered away. Oh despair.

The date was in Halifax. Or Sheffield. I couldn't travel with the group because their car was full. I journeyed by train.

Trains frighten me. And this train was packed.

The women were dressed in yellow two-piece outfits, their eyes were piercing blue, their hair lacquered, gold, and shaped like a deformed bread roll.

The men were in blue suits, wore crisp white shirts, tightly knotted ties and their hair was sparse and shiny silver. Behind conservative spectacles their steel grey eyes stared hard at me.

I shrunk into my seat and spewed up. The stink of the sick carried with me for the rest of the day.

I got off the train, I was dizzy and unhappy. Everything was out of my control. People lined up on the platform and laughed at me. The red carpet was rolled out for me. I followed it, reached a door at the limit, and entered.

THE AWFUL, turbulent mess of four-piece rock group raped my ears. Its blast knocked me backwards. The Lurkers... performing a soundcheck.

I like soundchecks. At soundchecks groups play just for themselves, find out things more than they do at rehearsals because the environment of soundchecks can be mysteriously influential.

In fact I am wondering whether to release a bootleg of soundchecks that I have recorded — "The Best Of Soundchecks".

The Lurkers would close their eyes, mostly because they are the closest it is possible to get to a soundcheck for a live performance of Reed's "Metal Machine Music". Noise with bumps and ridges, in The Lurkers' case in short sections.

No-one told me The Lurkers were avant-garde! Maybe this wasn't going to be quite the end after all. Maybe it was going to be rooky tooty.

Time to practice my clichés. "The Lurkers are going to drag us into the '80s, no messing."

Soundcheck over, I approached the lead singer, ex-culinary artist Howard Wall, who is confident and wry, slenderly built with cherry, chunky features and black hair that looks short at the front but straggles a good few inches over the collar. If the light catches him badly he resembles Paul McCartney.

The latter fact made me a little nervous. When I get nervous my nose runs and I'd forgotten my hankie.

We strolled away from the club looking for a pub like long lost chums who didn't know what to say to each other.

Guitar player Pete Stride joined us.

He used to be a packer. Bony and angular, his face thin and sallow, he possesses a fair 1973 Faces beret. And the Faces turn out to be his favourite group of all time.

The Faces made me laugh, but Pete Stride didn't. Nervous and cynical, he made me feel uneasy. This feeling didn't noticeably interfere with my numbness.

No pubs were open so we found a cafe. I had that cheese sandwich and tea. Wall had a glass of milk and a ham sandwich. Stride had a glass of milk.

Bassist Nigel Moore joined us.

He used to be a TV engineer. He is the most pleasant of the group, small, impish and concerned. His choice was omelette and chips and a glass of milk.

The cafe owner, an interested person played by Bill Maynard, discovered that the group weren't local. "No, we've come up from London, we're playing at the club down the road." "Oh yeah, musicians are you? What kind?" "Oh we're rock, y'know."

"Made any records?" "Yeah! One or two!" "Make a living?" "We get on O.K."

I didn't admire this conversation. It was obvious that everyone present thought I should be pouring the milk and the cafe owner should be writing the feature.

The Lurkers have been together approximately 18 months and the members used to go to the same Uxbridge pub.

Formation was due to an indefinable mixture of desire, rebellion, innocence, fantasy, greed, the Sex Pistols, ambition and frustration. They waited instinctively through 1977 on the fringes of the 'punk movement', rejected both due to their own attitude and the attitude of the movement poseurs and the press, gigging outside London at badly chosen and totally unsuitable venues, inside London as support to the likes of 999 at places like The Red Cow and The Roxy. Places they look back on with a mixture of affection and dismissal.

They tied up with Beggars Banquet, released a couple of singles and had a track on the Beggars Banquet "Streets" compilation. They worked hard. Lots of gigs.

They turned into 1978 with a thick, hardcore following, enough to push their third single, "Ain't Got A Clue", into the charts with a TOTP appearance, and to give their album "Fulham Fallout" a few weeks in the top 50.

The singles sold around 50,000, the album 20,000, which means The Lurkers have a strong partisan cult following that can easily be compared to the dogmatic worship of T. Rex received in the latter part of their existence.

Late 1978... and they still play the clubs. They have a new single out, and the four members each receive £50 a week for their application. Before it was £25, before that £15, and before that, nothing.

If they get more popular, an indeterminable fate, they make no promises about the size of venues that they'll play, except that they will make "damn sure" that there are no seats.

They make the type of noise that 1977 was saturated with, noise that is now heard very rarely, and when it is accepted as pure rock'n'roll, pure punk or rejected as a mindless anachronism. It's a noise that was influenced by the Stones, Velvet Underground, Faces, Black Sabbath, Alice Cooper, Pistols, Noise like Eater, Slaughter And The Dogs, The Drones, V.2., London, etc. ad nauseum.

The Lurkers don't make noise like The Ramones, but are often compared to them by people who cannot understand the metaphysics of rock'n'roll.

Many observers conclude the The Lurkers make unadulterated rock'n'roll. But in 1978, pure, unadulterated rock'n'roll is more Evan Parker or Cabaret Voltaire than The Lurkers. It all depends on what your definition of rock'n'roll is. I mused on this as Wall pushed his ham sandwich away with distaste, and a crushing sensation in my knee-caps forced me to hastily disregard this pretentious observation with the contempt it deserved.

I screamed inwardly, and Wall, Stride, and Moore knowingly looked at each other while they licked the milk marks from around their lips.

Milk! Rock'n'roll! Paint! Love! Milk! Rock!

I was trapped. I knew what was going on. There was nothing wrong with my theory. So why was I on it? What was my guilt?

WE LEFT the cafe sensible and sober, but the pubs would be open. I stepped out, the air feeling very distant from the action. A man called out to me. "Try it", he laughed, "you'll like it." What did he mean?

At the pub I bought this drink etc. This seemed the natural thing to do.

The group had a mugful of lager each, I had a whisky and ginger beer. Wall sneered at me, I blude legged at me. Moore looked at me with pity. The tension increased that I should be in control of affairs as much as I possibly could.

Shakily setting my bulky recording equipment in the low pub table between my small glass and Stride's back, I knew The Interview had begun. My origin story was smashed but I intuitively realised that I should be abrasive, relentless, demanding in my questioning, the core of rock 'n' roll would be mine.

The Centre Of The Universe!

I remembered a small anti-John Travolta poster I had seen advertising a Lurkers gig. It announced their intention to smash what they implied was a disease. So what have they got against John Travolta?

"Aah nothing", they chorused. "That was just a Beggars Banquet idea."

Banquet is their small-but-getting-bigger label, based around a chain of record shops of the same name. It has the contrived idealism of a 1977 conceived label and is lovable because of it. But it will never be a legend. I thought I sensed a tone of dissatisfaction in the group's attitude towards their label but they rejected the suggestion.

"They're good salesmen. They're good to us. It suits us having a small record company. We have complete musical freedom though they are a bit childish (giggle)."

Musical freedom for a group like The Lurkers doesn't seem like a vicious necessity but a dull ache in my head informed me that I was missing something obvious.

"Besides, who else would have us."

Everyone laughed. I did too.

AS A UNIT The Lurkers are self-deprecating, embittered, boastful, strangely proud, and happy doing what they're doing. Happy in different ways. For Wall, it's a laugh, for Stride it's all very serious — he wants to be a guitar hero. Moore, well, he isn't so sure.

After a few drinks drummer Manic Esso joined us.

He used to be a garage hand. One of those whose exploits the quirks and deficiencies of others for a chuckle or two, he's blunt, well built, muscley verging on the flabby with close-cropped fluffy red hair. He is at pains to correct a Record Mirror report that he is a 'dummy'. In fact he is pungently perceptive, with that harmless cruel streak. For him The Lurkers is a laugh — and life is one long joke.

So there we have the breakdown. The Lurkers. Play fast rock 'n' roll. It's a laugh, it's a little bit serious, it's a job.

I'm not so sure.

During the interview I maybe sweated an eighth of an inch off my gut. I channelled a series of mundane questions towards the musicians, mundane because I saw no other way that they should be, and they reacted with odd condescension and an occasional flare of interest.

A number of times Wall leant back in his chair, eyed me so close enough to notice my inability to shave properly and taunted. "Next question please."

Stride muttered that they'd say more if the questions were better. Moore wasn't so sure.

Esso played the fool.

So I was to concentrate on suffering, victimisation, isolation, insanity? Or just plain lust? Or Rimbaud's cancer? Were we to talk about the dream and rock 'n' roll in the same category? Was there something strong and overwhelming in The Lurkers make-up — Stride the creative artist, Wall the Neurotic, Moore the moralist and Esso the sinner?

What would you ask The Lurkers?

I should have asked about the experiences of early childhood.

This is now so obvious I have trouble doing the weekly shopping.

We followed the ancient paths of the rock interview. When did it all start? Where will it all finish? Wall insisted that he will always work in the music business "after all this" — the implication was spiritual and I gasped audibly at my blatant inferiority in this sphere — even if only in a record shop.

Did they ever feel part of a movement? Here we touched on their feelings of inverted snobbishness — that no-one loved them because they were The Lurkers, that no other musicians mixed with them, that they were outsiders. Still are, in fact. The whole world, they gloated, looked on them tight lipped and unloving. The group seemed quite fond of being looked upon with scorn.

"We've always tried to keep on the outside of things," they beamed. "We've tried to keep that little bit different. Everybody hates us. Everybody puts us down . . . so it's worked up to now!"

This, I must admit, appeared perverse. The Lurkers, being an inoffensive pop quartet who are as endearing as Travolta's sigh in "Summer Nights" and equally as profound, are not the kind of dedicated, devious artists who should require adopting these disconcerting tactics. Can you imagine Smokie or The Boomtown Rats playing so awkward?

PETE STRIDE. Pic: WALT DAVIDSON

I turned this over in my mind as I dutifully visited the bar to get another round in for the lads. I realised my theories were way off the mark. After all, why else should I be here?

There had to be a purpose.

I was undoubtedly out of my depth. I know no jokes. My speech impediment was intensified with realising that the group knew something I didn't and would never discover. They were so smooth and charming. The interview progressed in fits and bursts.

I grasped at what I felt sure was reality . . . yet . . . it seemed . . . so distant . . . so ludicrous, whatever, I pressed it. I wondered, my voice shaky and peaking a little too loud, why The Lurkers had won through whereas Eater, The Dogs, London, even Generation X had flipped, flopped, failed or finished.

This surely was a logical line of inquiry, but The Lurkers could hardly bring themselves to comment. Undoubtedly they were in the right; the pain in my kneecaps told me that.

"We've done a lot more gigs than those bands, we work 90 per cent of the year. We don't spend our time gigging."

They tell me of their one go at 'gigging', at a Ramones reception:

"We had a really great chat. All of a minute." They didn't feel the group were very intelligent. "Besides, we mean it. Other groups just sang awful dole queue lyrics, whereas our songs have a story. Plus we're the best on stage. No-one plays with as much energy as we do."

Derek Bailey?

"Plus we don't act like bloody superstars."

Neither does Derek Bailey and he once played with Morecambe and Wise. (Hot roots!)

We rambled about audiences, responsibility . . . "We get dictated to by our audiences because we are catering to them . . . but we give them a good night . . . we don't want them to go away thinking 'yeah, it was OK', we want more than that . . ."

"If we play two nights at The Marquee you get people complaining about the heat."

"So we play The Lyceum, no seats in the way, 2000 can get in, and everyone complains it's a shitty place. What can we do?"

AAH THE eternal paradox of rebellious young punk groups caught up in the rock machine. It's a shame, all these problems and contradictions. But The Lurkers, I could see, will take each day as it comes, with small reservation.

The Lurkers, I could see, will love to be enormous.

The Lurkers deserve to be enormous, apparently.

What about Jimmy Pursey's The Kids? "Do we do it for The Kids? Yeah, I suppose we do. Give them bloody pleasure in their lives. We didn't consciously do it for The Kids. The Kids just happened to get into us. They just happen to like us, which is great. They buy the records anyway . . . yeah we do it for The Kids. Certainly not the bloody money."

Such sentiments stunned me.

"We'll keep plugging on. We're The Lurkers. We're on the outside looking in . . . everyone's doing Hammersmith Odeon and we're still doing the Doncaster Outlook."

The conversation spluttered to an end. Wall's ideals seemed to be the songs of Buzzcocks, the on-stage presentation of Wayne County, and he reckoned The Lurkers were some lubricated alliance of these two worthies. The group predicted that in all areas, songs, audiences, awareness they are going to expand strongly.

It was hopeless. I couldn't understand what I was meant to uncover, discover, find out. The group knew I didn't understand. The group didn't want me to understand.

I was failing. Maybe it was too late.

I went with the group to that night's gig. I recall a room broken up by chairs and tables, with two bars, a small raised platform and about 150 people present. It might have been a party.

The Lurkers played their set. It was rough. It was loud like rock groups should be. Lots of short, similar songs. I couldn't see much over people's bobbing heads, a vision that seemed somehow to merge with the noise. The guitar drone and the heads as one.

I could see Wall's grin, Moore's concentration, catch occasional flashes of Stride's crucial whipping left wrist as he scythed the centre of The Lurkers' noise with much intent, sense Esso's exertion.

I didn't feel a thing. The Music drifted away. I couldn't cope. To me it was nothing.

SO WHY had I been sent? Confusion escalated. Bewilderment began to hurt. The audience adored it all. I slumped to the floor. I shivered. I cried.

I fled from the club, ran away, lost myself in side streets, ran and ran ignoring the searing pain slicing my chest. I ran anywhere, blindly, finally crumpling on a park bench.

I slept and dreamt of reality.

I woke whenever. The park seemed to be called Hyde Park, so I confidently made for Marble Arch. The surroundings seemed a bit odd. Peculiar vast buildings curving and rising on the horizon. Small, narrow streets, lots of steep rises . . . I panicked. Cold burned the inside of my nose. My limbs ached. I felt a huge impossible awful gap. A massive loss.

A policeman strolled by. He chided me: "You failed to understand the very essence of rock 'n' roll. Of life. The Lurkers offer all this and more, and what do you do . . . ? How do you behave . . . ?" He spat and left me, I was alone. Absolutely alone.

It was as if the shame of it all would outlive me.

Well, they said anything could happen.

The hi-fi system you listen to while you're saving up to buy it.

Working out how to pay for hi-fi is almost as difficult as choosing it.

For even the most dedicated buff, finance invariably outweighs any amount of technical consideration.

We at Pioneer think it only fair that if you choose our equipment you not only know how much it's going to cost, but exactly how you're going to pay for it.

So we've introduced the Pioneer Privilege Purchase Plan. Simply an inexpensive credit facility operated through Citibank Trust.

It's available to everyone choosing equipment worth £250 or more.

All we ask is 20% deposit and a few days to clear your credit rating. Then the hi-fi's all yours.

Check the scheme out with your local Pioneer dealer (he's in Yellow Pages) or write directly to us.

Once you know exactly how the plan works, you may find you can actually afford something a little better than you envisaged.

Like a Pioneer Rack System.

The plan certainly takes all the uncertainty out of buying hi-fi.

So when you're sitting listening to your new Pioneer system the only thing on your mind will be the beauty of the sound. Not money.

SID LATEST

NME's JOE STEVENS filed this report from New York on Tuesday.

Another friend, Joe Stevens of the broken-up Sex Pistols group, said: "Nancy died and Sid was keeping his part of the bargain on their suicide pact. But he blew it, didn't he?" Vicious, whose real name is John Hinch, had gone into the bathroom of his room at the Hotel Deville at 2 a.m. His mother Anne, 38, was in bed next door.

Razor

Moments later he came out of the bathroom with both arms covered in blood. "First he saw one of those disposable plastic razors which he broke open with the back of his shoe," said Stevens. "And when that didn't work he smashed a light bulb and shaved himself."

Express

Joseph Stevens is an American photographer who was one of the first on the scene, said: "Vicious told me there was a suicide pact."

"He said that he and Nancy had been planning to kill themselves for a long time."

HOSPITAL

Stevens added: "There was blood everywhere when I arrived. Both his arms were badly cut."

Sun

British band leader Vicious immediately after the suicide attempt, said: "He missed the main point."

Denied

"He asked me for drugs," he said, he wanted to join Nancy.

"He's starting to believe that he's going to have to spend twenty years in prison."

Mirror

Publicity stunts meet the people. COOPER-CLARKE does it for the camera of DENIS O'REGAN (above). ELVIS and BEBE flee (left).

SUNDAY AFTERNOON IN THE PARK WITH EL & J.C.C

J.C.C. AT 2.45" the white sign read, looking for all the world like some bookie's greyhound racing placard.

But there were no bookies or greyhounds to be seen last Sunday at Speaker's Corner where CBS, having wine and dined a party of journalists, photographers and the like, unveiled current golden boy John Cooper-Clarke amid the harangues of loud-voiced pro-Zionists and the usual gauged contingent of "Jesus Saves" red-nosed believers.

Clarke, a slightly built lad, mounted a modestly proportioned soap-box at quarter to three on the dot to deliver "Kung Fu", "I Married A Monster From Outer Space" and a swift chaser of "Health Fanatic" and "I've Got A Brand New Track Suit".

two companion pieces from his debut album "Disguise In Love". Not a monumental performance — a bit brusque to tell the truth — with our John's voice, accompanied simply by the determined stamp of his red Amello & Davide Beate boots, suffering in contrast to the more seasoned bellows of that precinct.

The arguable highlight of the performance came when a loud-baller was suddenly produced and handed to Clarke, who proceeded to utilize this technological landmark for a couple of verses until he was rudely grabbed from his box by a phalanx of coppers — four in fact who threatened to chuck him out of the park if the implement was used any further.

It wasn't used any further, and the only subsequent incident of any consequence involved none other than a sparsely disguised Elvis Costello, who turned up to witness Clarke accompanied by (irony of ironies) Bebe Buell, model and ex-girlfriend of ... well, mostly recently it was Rod Stewart but before that? Well, there's Jimmy Page, Ron Wood, Keith Richards, John Oates, Steven Tyler and Iggy Pop — not to mention Todd Rundgren.

The sight of Elvis with Ms Buell was almost surrealistic, particularly as Costello, in funny hat and shades, looked just like our Wally from Walkhamston having just won the pool. Indeed, such was the bizarre appearance of Costello that when he approached our own Nick Kent, the latter didn't recognize him till he told him who he was.

An amiable conversation ensued based around EL's current activities. The new album is almost finished, and its creator's avowed intention is to title it "Emotional Fascism" — although strong corporate forces are already murmuring in tones of protest about this choice. Beyond that, Kent claims he's sworn to secrecy, although Messrs. Clarke and Costello seem to have formed a mutual appreciation society that had been consummated the night before when EC played to the visiting Mancunian at his new Queensway apartment. Celebrations were in the air, as Elvis has chosen Cooper-Clarke as special guest on his up-coming tour.

Meanwhile back at Speaker's Corner, keener eyes than Kent's had noticed Costello, and a deluge of photographers suddenly appeared, causing EL to throw a brief tantrum, though at least he didn't get physical this time. Instead he promenade the area, furtively requesting a final adieu from J.C.C. (who'd unfortunately already split) before diving into the nearest subway, this year's model in tow.

BEHIND [NME] LINES BARGAIN BASEMENT

YOU'RE SO smart, right? Riddle us this: when is a rock book not a rock book? When it's The Boy Looked At Johnny, Julie Burchill and Tony Parsons' obituary of rock and roll. "Handle with caution," the blurb announces. "The authors come not to praise rock but to bury it."

And if there's any rock and roll left scrambling for air after the earth gets shovelled back on its artfully dishevelled head, then it ain't Tony and Julie's fault. THIS BOOK IS EXACTLY WHAT IT SAYS IT IS. Every last icon gets thoroughly clasted.

We don't remotely believe that you're going to agree with more than a certain fixed percentile of the opinions expressed, but you'd have to be a fairly timid, well-trained and chronically respectful sort of fan type person not to cheer the drastic duo on to greater flights of endeavour as they ruthlessly drag away the snakeskin platforms (and the broiled creepers, and the artfully grimed sneakers) off the numerous clay pedal extremities of everyday rock folk.

The tome in question is published by Pluto Press for £1.25, but if you want to save some, be the first in your cell block and lay your hands on a priceless collectors' item, then fill in the coupon, which a quid in the envelope (along with your address, name) and send it off. You'll not only receive a pre-publication, pre-lawsuit copy of The Boy Looked At Johnny, but if you're among the first 500, you get it autographed by your two favourite counterculture heretics.

OH !!!? NOT MORE COOK AND MOORE...

SUNDAY NIGHT with Virgin Leisure Industries — for a true "mega gross out" starring that lovable impresario of record shops, studio facilities, country houses, record companies and cinemas Richard "If it's naked and mouthing obscenities I'll sign it" Branson.

The scenario is the latest in the vast Branson Empire — Town House Studios in Shepherd's Bush. The cast includes ageing Virgin executives dressed up to amuse their boss, a stripper, a film crew, an excess of Virgin liggers, and the man who have made more money out of "fuck" than Henry Miller. D. H. Lawrence and Linda Lovelace combined — loveable little Dudley Moore and aristocratically aloof Peter Cook.

The occasion is the latest "recording" of the forthcoming Derek And Clive album, and the whole grotesque performance is being immortalised on celluloid by a camera crew with a budget of £20,000 — ironic seeing that, according to my calculations, the studio costs (six hours at £60 per hour) amounted to a piddling £360.

That means £360 to produce the album and £20,000 to produce the film of the album.

But then when you're a major leisure industry it's only proper that the film of the studio session of the record of the book of the comic of the grossout be recorded for posterity.

On our arrival Cook and Moore, looking somewhat the worse for wear, were at a very low ebb, searching desperately for something to talk about.

When they did actually start recording a "track" two facts became obvious.

(1) Without the compensatory props of showers of "fucks" and "shits" Peter Cook and Dudley Moore were not very funny.

(2) The myth of totally improvised humour was shot to pieces by Cook producing a script of a predictable send up of Mr and Mrs.

You know the sort of thing: "Now Mrs Jones, if you went on holidays and forgot your husband's sunburn cream would he (a) ask you to open your legs so he could shade his head under your dress (b) wear a half coconut over his nose (c) take his trousers off and tie them over his head."

After half an hour it was obvious that Mr and Mrs Cook and Moore were not deviating one millimetre from the well-tried formula of the previous two albums.

The usual charming and tasteful topics were up for exegesis — you know, necrophilia (this time apparently with one of the recently deceased Popes although Mary Whitehouse and the blasphemy laws may torpedo that one), sodomy, fellatio, masturbation, and abuse of the dead.

After a while the effect of a non-stop dialogue about knobs, sucking, horns, death, cancer etc produces a feeling of pointless excess.

Even Dudley eventually succumbed. He staggered out, leaned against the mixing board, and with the exhausted look of a man who'd spent a month in a broiel, remarked, "If I hear another 'suck' or 'fuck' or 'shit' I'll explode."

To give the evening a depth and significance it wouldn't otherwise have possessed, prankster Richard Branson had devised some "terrific wheezes".

Midway through a stirring performance of "Jump", especially for the cameras and the movie, a rather sleazy detective-on-the-make, complete with suede coat and suede manner, barged in — followed by the shaggiest and most unconvincing collection of cops ever to grace the London constabulary.

While Virgin accountant Barry Moore (whose cup costume was numbered PC99) took names, Virgin International man Laune Dunn stood guard. Cook and Moore, not being in on the joke were appropriately subdued while Branson went into paroxysms of laughter.

No more than 10 minutes later saw the arrival of the next jape — a stripper who without even the most cursory preliminaries revealed her ample charms and proceeded to flop all over Pete and Dud.

Cook and Moore seemed somewhat put out.

After writing "Go Home" across the stripper's tits, Cook went, rather sheepishly, looking for his wife, who proceeded to hide under the mixing board.

Moore, in one of the night's few hilarious moments, started playing the "Moonlight Sonata" while singing "I've got a horn" over and over again.

But let's get back to the point, it is difficult to understand why the duo continue to make such albums — since what was once spontaneous now seems so contrived.

Cook once remarked to me that the only reason he did it was "because Richard Branson invented this lovely thing called money". This latest outing gives great weight to that rare flash of honesty.

WHO REALLY RUNS ROCK'N'ROLL?

IN RECENT YEARS a whole slew of documentaries, books, magazine articles and newspaper stories have professed to take the lid off the music business. In fact, all just skirt round the edges, ignoring the basic fact that the music industry is dominated and controlled by a small number of very large entertainment corporations who, like the Seven Sisters of the oil business, really call the shots. This is the first in an occasional series of articles which attempt to redress the balance, to make a public record of the vast holdings of the multinational conglomerates, not only in the music business, but in every other sphere of entertainment and beyond. From these facts, it is hoped the reader can draw his or her own conclusions.

AT THE press launch for EMI America last Christmas, Bhaskar Menon, then chairman of Capitol Industries-EMI, painted a clear picture of the empire he was soon to control.

"As an international network of music companies, Capitol-EMI have a profound presence in every major record market in the Free World.

"We are international leaders in our industry because for nearly 80 years, our record companies in 34 countries on five continents have brought the joy of recorded music to millions of consumers.

"The support of our recording studios, manufacturing plants, distribution networks, and sales, promotional and marketing capabilities enable Capitol-EMI to recognise the increasing abolition of frontiers in public taste, attitudes and life styles while retaining a deep sense of involvement with the distinctive cultures and the economic, social and political aspirations of the various world communities to which we belong."

Since that speech Menon has been promoted to a position that amounts to Chief Executive, EMI Music, The World.

He is arguably the most powerful figure in the international music business, heading a corporation that produces one out of every five records sold worldwide, and his aims and strategy are uncompromising.

On his appointment, he announced sweeping changes within the structure of the EMI Music empire, claiming: "The imperative object of EMI operations is simply to achieve unquestioned worldwide supremacy in our business. (This) organisation... will, in my opinion, provide us with relevant, unified, worldwide leadership."

BHASKAR Menon, now 44, grew up in an atmosphere of money and power. Born into an influential Indian family, his father was Secretary of Finance in the Government of India and his uncle was Foreign Secretary and Ambassador to China and the USSR. Menon studied at the University of Delhi, obtaining an MA in Economics, before coming to Britain where he obtained an MA in Politics, Philosophy and Economics at Oxford University.

His education complete, he joined EMI, on the advice of his Oxford University tutor, and has remained with them for the 22 years since, rising through the ranks from management trainee to his current position of power.

The ultimate accolade to his management skills came when he was assigned to take over the then ailing Capitol Industries. EMI's American identity. He later commented on this: "Considering Capitol's crashing losses, low morale and wholesale management changes enhancing people's insecurity, my own appointment at that time could have been seen as the ultimate act of insanity."

Within a year he had turned Capitol's $15 million loss into profit. His motto for his employees was simple: "Uncompromising excellence in what you do goes without saying. We expect more than that."

travelled to London with a new-fangled 'gramophone' in his baggage, on the lookout for financial backing. His chance meeting with a solicitor named Trevor Williams led to the foundation of the Gramophone Company, which established its His Masters Voice trademark the following year, began signing major artists like Caruso, and quickly spread across the Edwardian globe. The company already had record factories in Calcutta and St. Petersburg when, in 1931, it merged with its main rival of the time (Columbia) to form Electrical and Musical Industries (EMI) it established itself as a virtual European monopoly.

EMI's current music holdings alone are staggering, and represent a fully-integrated operation, from the factory floor to the consumer. In the UK they license and distribute more labels than any other company, and in the period 1976-1977 captured 19 per cent of the singles market and 22 per cent of the album market, putting them ahead of all competition.

Their record pressing factory at Hayes, Middlesex is the second largest in the world, producing some 5 million records and tapes each month, and has warehousing space for some 6 million records.

On the retail level they have a string of 35 shops plus their flagship, the HMV store in Oxford Street — the largest record shop in Europe — which has an annual turnover of 4 million, some 100,000 customers a week, and accounts for 2% of the UK's total tape and record sales.

ALTHOUGH a low-key operation, music publishing is where the real wealth lies.

In 1976 Chairman Sir Joseph Lockwood told the trade magazine Billboard that the profitability of EMI's music publishing is so much greater than the recording company that "it is almost impossible to get them on the same balance sheet."

EMI already held copyright on 100,000 songs (including "Happy Birthday To You") when it made a deal to buy up Columbia Pictures' music publishing interests, which added a further 25,000 songs to their catalogue — including million sellers by The Monkees, Carole King, David Gates, Cat Stevens and the like.

They are now one of the three largest copyright holders in the world.

THE KIND of megaculture that a corporation like EMI Music can wield has been demonstrated time and again, but nowhere more forcibly than in their promotion campaigns for TV albums, a game of high risks and high rewards reserved for the really high rollers. K-Tel and other merchandising companies may have pioneered the field, but within two years EMI had grabbed a hefty 26% share of a market which this year will gross and estimated £35 million.

Remember also that EMI Music provides only 50% of the profits of the much larger parent conglomerate, EMI Ltd., six letters which signify the largest multinational corporation in the leisure entertainment field — by a vast margin, their profits may have dipped this year from a peak £64.7 million to £25.9 million, but this must be regarded as little more than a minor setback for this giant enterprise.

No matter how you choose to entertain yourself, you're fairly sure to be putting money in EMI's pocket. Their film division, for instance, not only makes films, but also owns, Elstree Studios and controls the 284 cinema screens of the ABC circuit.

The leisure group control theatres, bingo halls, hotels, discos, marinas, sports and social clubs, bowling alleys, golf courses and more besides.

If you go out to eat at an Angus Steak House, a Golden Egg Restaurant, a Tennessee Pancake House or visit an Ice Cream parlour — you're an EMI consumer.

They own the Blackpool Tower, and their property holdings in the centre of London alone are worth millions. The Mecca Ballroom in Leicester Square is theirs; also the Prince of Wales Theatre, the Talk of the Town nightclub and The London Experience.

London TV viewers might wish to know that they also have a 50% interest in Thames TV.

EMI claim their music profits have been cut drastically due to the rise of home taping. But EMI is also a major supplier of blank tape in Europe, so they win both ways.

Wherever you look, the EMI Empire seems to be there — quietly grinding along, shaping and profiting from all forms of popular entertainment.

BEATLES GET BAQUE!

STARSHOOTER, France's premier punques, have achieved ultimate notoriety, or should that read ignominy — they're being sued by The Beatles.

Or at least, by A&O Music, the French representatives of Beatle music copyright holders, Northern Songs.

Last year these punques celebrities decided to release a single titled "Get Baque", based rather squarely on the Fab Four's "Get Back". Sample lyric:

"Who needs The Beatles and their shitty music, just good for assholes / Radio bores with their old songs I could not care less about / How long are they going to keep playing this cabaret act? / Get back, get back to where you belong!"

Something of the rhyme and the vitriol gets lost in translation, but you get the gist.

EMI France agreed to issue the single. They refused the first cover (a picture of The Beatles with their heads cut off and splattered with blood) but okayed a sleeve with the four Starshooters imitating the "Let It Be" cover.

The single was a big flop. First of all, every DJ in the country felt personally insulted by the lyrics. And legend has it that all the promo copies made it into the garbage can (usually they're given to the cleaners). So, with no radio play and very little press, Starshooter took to the road to promote the single.

But the average French fan was almost as affronted as those DJs. Many a night Starshooter would be assaulted and insulted by hard core Beatles fans, and in the clubs fights broke out between punks and Fab four loyalists.

Realising what was happening, EMI decided to "let the single die" after the first 5,000 copies were sold. And when in June Starshooter made an LP, they agreed to exclude "Get Baque".

So, one year later, it came as a big surprise to them to discover they were being sued for the song. Almost as big a surprise as it was for us to discover that anyone gave a hoot about The Beatles ten years on, but... is it good or bad publicity? Is it any publicity at all? Starshooter's singer/songwriter Kent Hutchinson doesn't seem concerned:

"When we did it we thought it was funny and that everybody would have a good laugh! Personally, I don't like The Beatles. And what I like even less is that they are like Gods to all these people. Like, they would come to see us and say, 'Why did you do that? Were you drunk?'"

You must like the Beatles deep down inside!"

And the prospect of a court case hardly troubles him.

"I don't care. They are suing our publishing company, let those vampires have a nice little trial!"

But then, Starshooter are already way ahead of this first outrage. Last week their new single, "Betsy Party", became number one on French radio, right up there in front of John Travolta! "Betsy Party" made them the first French new wave gang to do it on the radio.

Plus spies warn us that large amounts of Starshooter records have been spotted in the office of a well known record company located not a million miles away from Portobello Road. Could this mean they'll be playing in England soon?

And considering the commercial non-event of Sgt. Pepper, does this mean Robert Stigwood had the wrong approach all along?

KISS CONQUER SECRET OF SUCKING UP TO PLANET EARTH

THE SECOND instalment of Marvel Comics' Kiss saga went on sale recently in the U.S.

The first, published last year, turned out to be one of the biggest-selling comics in Marvel's history, and therefore one of the all-time best-selling comics. The new one has the largest print run in Marvel's history—which may explain why, unlike the first, it doesn't claim to have been printed with genuine Kiss blood...

Despite a less illustrious credit roster, it's an improvement on the first comic. Endowed with super-powers befitting their costumed personalities, the four buffoons do battle with the evil darklord Kheis-Wu, who wants to dominate the world (what else?) with energies stolen from rock concerts through the ages. This entails a visit to "The Land Of Leftovers", where "the symbolic figures of the '60s are doomed to live out the decade unto eternity." Kiss are guided to this land by a cynical dwarf who "drops by now again for a beer and some target practise."

The success of the Kiss comic has spurred Marvel into plans for more rocky horror comics, and a recent issue of The Defenders titled "Agents Of Fortune" featured characters drawn from Blue Oyster Cult mythology, including the Cult Of The Harvester Of Eyes. As far as we know, however, Spider-Man has no plans to form a band.

The Kiss comic is but one small part of the current Kiss marketing strategy, which finds the foursome's ever-growing alter-egos encroaching further upon the ruins and pockets of impressionable American youth.

It coincides with the Kiss TV movie Kiss Meets The Phantom Of The Park, a live-action adventure with some concert footage. Directed by horror films veteran Gordon Hessler, it features standard super-hero special-effects fare involving minimal plotting and plenty of posturing, with the biggest budget ever allocated to a made-for-TV movie.

And then there's the solo albums. One from each member, available on the same day either separately or as a set. Kiss have a long record of going for optimum pecuniary advantage with their (often recycled) product, but this particular gambit must take the cake.

They confidently expect fans to purchase all four albums, and just in case they don't, there's a Kiss break-up ruse ready to be used should interest sag. This would be followed, in time to catch next year's Xmas pocket money, with a reunion.

But whatever happens, it's clear that the Kiss organisation intend to transcend the limited financial viability of rock music, just as the Kiss characters themselves become ever more unreal denizens of a fantasy world.

The cost of their gaudy live spectacle is such that, on one recent Japanese excursion, they simply set up the show to run for five nights in a sports arena, and let people come to them rather than touring the country. It's far more lucrative to keep the kiddies enthralled via other media, and Kiss will soon begin work on a full-length feature film follow-up to the TV movie.

Like H.B. Sarnum said, you can fool some of the people all of the time... But who would have thought that all you need to do is overgrown platform boots and stick-on halloween masks?

The Straits take off their Sacha shoes and sail the Suzi Q:

WANDERING PAST rows of terraced houses in the part of Leeds' urban sprawl called Harehills, past 'Paki' Top Shops, 'Chinky' chippies and junk stalls on every corner, you just know there must be an all-girl band called The Straits living around here somewhere.

Washing lines, saris and reggae waft in the air as I reach their abode, and The Straits stand before me in tight jeans, striped socks and plastic-leather jackets festooned with badges, like a clutch of girls backstage at a Sweet concert. Fans to the core.

I first saw them just over a year ago. Rhythm guitarist Shirl had advertised for girl musicians and they played what they'd been weened on — Bolan, Ziggy, period Bowie, Chinn-Chap bubble-gum and, of course, Sweet.

In mid-'77, the instant nostalgia of this glam-rock revivalist outfit was immensely enjoyable. They had a singer called Ziggy and, yes, she looked, sang and acted like her namesake. I'll leave you to ponder the sexual connotations of a young girl dressed up as a man who was, in any case, dressed up as an hermaphrodite. "Suffragette City" was never like this.

Shirl tells me that 'Ziggy' is long gone, as is most of their old set. Only Bolan's "Get It On" remains. The rest of their material is their own, but they remain a pop group. No longer self-conscious revivalists, their music is '78 pop:

"Wendy went to the discos / The Sacha shoe mafia / She wore wedged platforms and stood on your toes / Don't dance to Northern soul / Don't dance to rock and roll / It's only the girls who dance / The boys just wait for a pick-up chance / Unmatched suits, eight pints and you're a man.

for beggy panted beer boys whose idea of a good night out is a quick grope, eight pints, curry and chips and a huge puke (though not necessarily in that order).

"We went to discos when we were younger and saw through it," says Di, bassist and vocalist. "We've turned to rock for escape. When I'm on stage I pretend I'm Elvis."

"But it's not all make believe,

We all want to go all the way with this band and make it big." The rest of them agree that they don't want to spend their youth surrounded by tacky Macca decor, listening to canned soul muzak, pretending that's where it's at.

"Sure," I innocently reply when they ask if I want to hear their first studio recordings. They hit me for 10p for the meter. That means they can plug in the electric kettle, too. Lunch is Yorkie bars and Kit-Kat with instant coffee, and it seems appropriate that the music is fast confection with new wave sensibility.

The clear, strong vocals from Judi and Di stand out particularly on "Studio 54":

"The manager picks you out of the queue / We wouldn't stand a chance, kids like me and you / Unless you name's Bianca Jagger / Unless you dance like John Travolta / Watch out Britain, here comes the USA, OK / Don't forget your MacDonald's takeaway / Here comes Studio 54."

Though their musical roots are British, it strikes me odd that they sing about such dreadful Americanisation while sitting around in Levis and leather, eating fast foods. Shirl, who wrote the lyrics, sees it differently.

"Studio 54" is about the side of American culture we have, but Elvis and Suzi Quatro are great. Take what you need from America but don't get swallowed up in the dress that's rammed down your throats."

All the band get animated at the mention of Suzi Q, and it becomes apparent they are as confident and dedicated as that lady — out to win.

"It's better than hairdressing," says Shirl, and we all laugh.

Any parting comments, girls?

"We're the best band in our street," says Judi Rock.

THRILLS

"The End Walk" (Metropole) is a fairly decent cartoon story about a racist queen by the name of a reggae or sound consciousness who used to provide the popular Welsh vocalist, Thomas Driess.

And on 22 October, for two weeks, John Travolta will return in his latest, much publicised film "Grease".

DAVID JONES AND THE KING BEES Lisa Jane Doona F-13407. Production: Lee Conn. What may well turn out to be an embarrassing deviation from the Thin White Duck's colour. Recorded in mono in 1964, Lisa Jane is a tough, gritty, r'n'b song from Bowie's first group. Shouldn't all well, considering the scramble for Bowie memorabilia and the NME's recent extensive documentary.

Film fun with Bard Dylan in the Irish Times (from Ronan Henry, Dublin) and Jah Travolta, according to the Scarborough Mercury, is going on holiday (from M Baragan, Newby). Bowie, meanwhile, assumes yet another unlikely identity in Radio & Record News.

CALL ME "irresponsible", call me "unreliable", throw in "elitist snob", too — nevertheless, I'm in love with Lou Grant.

Every man-jack one of you that was ever weaned on TV dinners and Muriel Young should be hurling Yana Mintoff from Westminster's public gallery onto the heads of Our Leaders in protest against the greatest programme currently flickering through the cathode ray tube being condemned to a time-slot (Tuesday, round about midnight) that would seem to restrict the show's potential audience to insomniacs with that snore-snout sleepless feeling and a young person's healthy disgust for the rockbiz menopause of the Old Grey Whistle Test.

While Fanlight Annie impersonates Debbie Harry's grandmother and hosts the Alternative Culture's Pebble Mill, the discerning viewer's dial is touched to the independent network put the journalist's vocation into perspective with incisive, ironic affection that give Lou Grant its magic. A bird sits singing on the branch of a tree until the lumberjack chops it down, the timber flows downstream to be transformed into empty pages stuffed into deadline typewriters, the printer's presses rumble and the Los Angeles Tribune hits the street still warm, gets delivered frequently mutilated by a careless paper-round for perusal over another morning coffee cup and finally — who needs yesterday's news? — ends up lining the bottom of a cage where pet budgie sits on his perch, tweeting derisively.

The characters that work for the Los Angeles Tribune could be straight out of most any newspaper with a back-bone in the Western World. Lou Grant (Edward Asner) is the wise-cracking, hard-boiled City Editor with a heart of gold-plate and printer's ink flowing through his veins. Art Donovan (Jack Bumton) is the perennial bachelor boy who believes the best defence is cynicism, a bawling, ageing, singles bar habitué going through the motions of having the time of his life, lonely for a long time but just starting to get scared.

Animal (Daryl Anderson) is the unwashed, long-hair lens-man late of the '60s cultural revolution coming to terms with the '70s — drop-back-in-or-starve — his opportunism for the "good pic" making him tolerable to the capitalists as a photographer even if hippie B.O. means they can't cope with him as a man, man.

Charlie Hame (Manon Adams) is a soft-hearted family man at home and a stoical, pragmatic, somewhat dog-eared veteran Editor in the office while the paper's owner up on the 25th floor is Margaret Pyschon (Nancy Marchand), a well-to-do, urbane middle-aged Lady with a superbly dry sense of humour and a big stick she never uses unless she has to — she is indulgent, maternal even, and she calls all the shots.

Girl reporter Billie Newman

(Linda Kelsey) plays that asexual, surrogate-boy role that Stateside TV gives to any young female character that they want to stress isn't a scarlet-lips, harlot-hips strumpet (adopting a boy's name preferable and see the rosy-cheeked courier in The Love Boat for full definition). Billie has to reconcile her social conscience with the demands of editorial policy, and she overcomes any prejudices against her gender (especially the talented, ambitious ones) with her ability to write circles around/trade insults with the best of 'em.

But my favourite Lou Grant character is the Los Angeles Tribune's Journalist As Star, Joe Ross (Robert Walden), a third generation Irish-American working-class kid made goodish, all tyro Woodstein energy, wrapped up in his writing to the point of blindered obsession, pure ego.

Random vignette: Ross is working on an article for the Trib protesting against City Hall's decision to rip down a condemned tenement at dawn where an old black newspaper seller has covered the walls in raw, tragic, autobiographical paintings that the art-circle's coterie considers to be the work of a primitive genius. Suddenly Ross turns away from his typewriter in hopeless exasperation.

EDWARD ASNER perfects the Lou Grant smile — wry, warm, half-cooked, but never wise-ass.

ROSSI: It's no good! We're never gonna save that place...
BILLIE: How do you know? Maybe once your article has appeared —

ROSSI: Look, the Trib tried to save some building due to be torn down seven years ago. Miss Pynchon, the paper's lawyers, historical architecture experts, all the paper and most of the public were fighting City Hall trying to stop 'em destroying the building. The Trib had everything on its side except for City Hall...

BILLIE: What happened?
ROSSI: They tore it down anyway.

BILLIE: But there's one thing they didn't have, Rossi...

ROSSI: Whaaaaat?
BILLIE: They didn't have you writing the article then, Rossi!
ROSSI: You're right!

Rossi begins to attack his typewriter with renewed religious passion...

The casting, acting and directing in Lou Grant are near faultless for guessing the script-writer's previous profession.

The characters in Lou Grant love and believe in their paper, they live with it 24 hours a day and hate it for demanding so much. They slog their guts out together but would be far too self-conscious to ever discuss aloud the motives, aspirations and ideals that give them their unification of purpose. And the smart-ass quips, shot-nerved angry bitching and rampant ego-clashing of the editorial meetings are so dextrously accurate that they border on cruel, hilarious documentary evidence.

And each week the myriad magic moments of Lou Grant rotate around strong plot-lines that tackle contemporary social issues with a righteous sense of the dramatic. In past weeks we Lou Grant cognoscenti have seen the brother of a petty crook who got wasted by the cops take over the Trib offices at gunpoint in a desperate bid to clear his brother's name. A decrepit High Court judge who made racist jokes, fell asleep and abused the accused using all his influential muscle to prevent the paper exposing his antics. An investigation into the American Nazi party...

The huge finances behind The Paper rearing their ugly head in a battle to prevent a take-over bid. The callousness of objective journalism when Charlie Hume's daughter is coming in on a crippled Jumbo about to crashland and the Trib has got two headlines prepared already, one for a safe landing and one for airline disaster.

Lou Grant is compulsive viewing.

TONY PARSONS

GANGLAND ROCK & ROLL

EVER BEEN busted for non-possession of a hamburger? That was the bizarre possibility which confronted late night drinkers in Eric's Club, Liverpool, last Saturday week when they were joined at their tables by members of the Merseyside Police.

The Boys in Blue weren't there to discuss the finer points of the blistering Pirates set which had ended earlier. Instead the revellers were quizzed about their membership details and purchases of food and alcohol, and samples of their drinks were carefully poured into small containers to be taken away for analysis. Boozers without food were cautioned that an offence may, technically, have been committed...

In fact, as Eric's co-owner Roger Eagle explained, the raid was only a routine check-up on the club's licensing arrangements, without repercussions for the customers questioned. Nevertheless, its timing carries implications of a police backlash against the Liverpool clubs in general in the wake of what has hit the local headlines as "The Chicago Trial".

For, in spite of incidents like this, Eric's remains a veritable oasis of tranquillity in the violent, gangster-ridden world that Liverpool clubland has traditionally been.

With over a hundred clubs of all types and sizes in central Liverpool alone, and control of many resting in a relatively few hands, power-struggles for predominance have been common. In its seamier aspects this rivalry has involved armed, Chicago-style warfare culminating in the recent sensational court case — notorious for its unpleasant parallels with the Capone era — concerning one particularly grisly attack upon a suburban house in which the four assailants attempted to remove their victim's feet with less than surgical expertise.

That trial failed to produce any convictions and the renewed police interest in the clubs, Eric's included, is seen by Eagle and many others as the inevitable aftermath.

In the case of Eric's, however, Roger does suggest that one other factor may have inspired the police visit — the Sid Vicious affair, news of which had broken the day before. As Liverpool's and the North's number one club venue for new-wave acts, Eric's would make the obvious target for any punk-rock backlash.

Hip but still relaxed, renowned for a tasteful and astute booking policy, Eric's makes a welcome contrast with the average Liverpool club — dumb and discofied, tense and tacky — and any more concerted crack-down would make grim news indeed.

SOME GIRLS: ATLANTIC SURRENDER

IN RESPONSE to the campaign by the Rev. Jesse Jackson, head of Operation PUSH (see NME 7.10.78), Atlantic Records chairman Ahmet Ertegun is recommending that the Rolling Stones track "Some Girls" be re-edited because "the result is an insult — even though I know he (Jagger) didn't mean it."

After a hour-long meeting with Jackson, Ertegun said: "I can see that the majority of people do look upon this as an insult. It's not our wish to demean, insult, or make less of a people without whom there would be no Atlantic Records."

He commented: "The mores of the country are in flux. The artists we sign up have liberty, artistic autonomy. We can't dictate to these artists or we would lose them."

"There is a great deal of permissiveness in the print and motion picture business. Whether the record business can be a censor is not certain."

When questioned by reporters, Ertegun argued that "Jagger is certainly not consciously racist. He is consciously anti-racist. He owes his whole being to black people and black music."

Ertegun is trying to arrange a face-to-face meeting between Jagger and Jackson, who has threatened that the boycott will continue unless Jagger delivers a personal apology.

The legal aspects of the case are unclear. Atlantic Records are caught in the crossfire, as they may be subject to litigation should they attempt to censor the track.

Meantime in New York The Rolling Stones issued the following statement: "It never occurred to us that our parody of certain stereotypical attitudes would be taken seriously by anyone who has heard the entire lyrics of the song in question. No insult was intended, and if any was taken, we sincerely apologise."

Be a killer or be a real Stiff . . .

Why is label boss Dave Robinson surveying a train load of amiable artists and praying for violence (in a manner of speaking)? MAX BELL was there 'n' has the answers.

W. C. FIELDS would have hated the "Be Stiff" tour. A sixteen year child star who toured with Mickey Rooney? A performing punk dwarf called Eric? An upstart Yugoslavian marionette making mileage out of her statelessness?

Horror upon horrors, the idea of having to spend two months on a train with these people is enough to turn a man to drink.

No bourbon though. I settled for a Long Life and felt distinctly queasy. Couldn't get in the bog either. Dave Robinson was ensconced inside with The Guardian. Next to this the traumas of Jackie Coogan and that smirking little twit Freddie Bartholomew would have made for good company.

W.C. wouldn't have stepped out of his own puke to catch the 12.07 to Bristol Temple Meads. The Whistle Stop Tour again: every time someone whistles the train stopped.

We hadn't reached Slough and I was on my third. It's quicker by snail. Or bicycle. Stiff would have saved a lot of money if they'd thought of that.

The catchphrase for the "Be Stiff" tour was dreamed up by Stiff's resident dreamer Paul Conroy. "You're either on the train — or off the train", a remarkably original existentialism if you think about it. Paul heard one of the guards at Canvey say that to an OAP who was debating whether to take the Adayday to Balham.

Rest assured that the rolling stock leaving your local station anytime now is not the scene of drunken rock and roll spastic antics you'd imagined. They don't make Knol-Aid anymore but someone must have given the driver a packet of Space Dust. He had a pathological dislike of leaving the Metrolis and kept it down to 20 mph.

The journey was so laid-back that well-wishers were still waving good-bye when we got to Reading.

"Where's the coke?" a French writer demanded impatiently. I directed him to the crate and went off to collect the tickets.

The days have gone when every Stiff venture was greeted with media cries of "fresh air" and "truly wonderful". What were once gimmicks are now a five page centre spread. The name itself smacks of a built in obsolescence. "If it ain't Stiff . . . you can't choke for ever."

When Jake Riviera and Elvis went global it was a safe bet that round every corner ink stained hacks were opening a book on the label's staying power.

But Stiff obermeister Dave Robinson and the family in Norring Hill maintained the heist. They lost an American distribution deal with Island, and Arista are hedging on the option, but they sold enough footwear and lingerie to break even.

Virgin rode into the 70s on the proceeds from Mike Oldfield. They had an independent's vide once. Can Stiff survive the cut-throat world of rock?

This trip is being sponsored like a travelling tennis circus. A carriage is set aside for logistics and financial talks. Phonogram, Bron, Ensign, NME all gave their pounds in return for a namecheck.

See, it isn't a question of the lads getting well beaved, cracking a few jokes and strutting a couple of numbers on the side. Robinson, Stiff's wizard Irish mentor, ticks off the viables and the possibles en route.

I thought he was going to ask for a whip round.

If this tour doesn't produce another Costello or Dury then the computer read-out will snarl into a nasty headache: "This time the press will be more critical, they're always more critical of Stiff than the majors. No journalist ever says that CBS product is shit, they'll say it about us." A companion remarked that Robinson was less likely to asportate a writer's knees than a Grudge or a Rant.

"Britain doesn't have a critical press. Luckily they forget about the stunts which didn't work. The opening night on last year's tour was disastrous but the coach was so full of booze that when they woke up they could only remember they'd enjoy themselves. We got rave reviews."

Smearing under this undoubtedly incisive thrust I put down my Riddles and vowed abstinence.

THE ongoing journey was vivid with sweetness and light: sunshine birds twittering. There was Rachel Sweet poring intently over Hardy's Tess. The foreign lady Miss Lovitch and her good friend, the balding Mr Les Chappell played a sedate game of patience. The atmosphere was occasionally punctuated by the rude belching of Mr Jupp's entourage but this was only to be expected. I slumped back in a peaceful doze and thought of Wordsworth and Arnold.

Robinson woke me with a jolt: "By the time we get to Belfast the knives will be out. The bottom line is we're a record company, we must sell records. If an act isn't ambitious, they're off the label. Last year Elvis started off doing 'Neat Neat Neat' and obscure country numbers. Dury was to kill, to be top dog. When Elvis smelled the competition he went to his album. People must be ready to kill onstage. Lene is very ambitious."

Judging by the rotating six-act bill early indications are that Lovitch and her crew will easily expose the presentational shortcomings of the other acts.

The initial stretch takes in the U.K.'s prestigious seats of learning. Students are a notoriously captive audience who will endure anything, even Weekless Eric, rather than pretend to read their Sartres and mope suicidally in the halls of residence.

Besides, Stiff needs their grants: "The last tour lost £11,000 but we sold a lot of 'New Boots And Panties'." Current costing is estimated at a peak of £100,000. Preliminary bills are £40,000, the train runs on hire plus mileage.

Everyone, regardless of standing, musician or roadie, receives £75 a week. Add on hotel bills, food and drink for 50-odd — and The Blockheads, Lowes, Edmunds et al are conspicuously absent. Lene Lovitch and Akron dream-date Rachel Sweet have the most going for them. As Robinson says: "They're girls; it's like hitch-hiking."

Last time Weekless was the child of the tour. He'd collapse into Robinson's arms apres le gig and gaze emotionally at his benefactor enquire. "Woz I alright chief?"

This time young Eric pulls his own crowd, notably the only act to accomplish this feat. They pogo and gob like good uns front stage just like it says to do in the papers.

"I used to live in Bristol once," he told the enthralled audience. "Nice class of people." There was no stopping him after that. This is Eric's big shot. He careered manically across the boards, a trouper with the smell of greasepaint in his nostrils. I was moved to tears and had to leave. Eric played as if his little life depended on it.

Only Rachel, a heroine worthy of Richardson or Nineteen, can afford to relax the grip. Providing she doesn't fall foul of those writers who imagine that anything young (and female) must necessarily be that goddess in vinyl armour come to answer their prayers she'll do all right.

Her voice is remarkable enough, entrenched in the plastic tradition of Dolly and Tammy, though lacking their hideous homely facades. But I'd be patronising Ms. Sweet if I pretended she was anything out of the ordinary on the Bristol showing (unlike Dolly).

Her live presence was mediocre. It lacked nerves, true — but also balance, consistently sympathetic material and personality. Sixteen-year-old Akron cutie pics fall a trifle flat in the cold light of a British autumn.

She breezed through her best numbers — those penned by Liam Sternberg — "Truckstop Queen", "Wildwood Saloon", and they worked on inherent quality not application. Her inter-number dialogue consisted of Americanisms like "this is my punk number" and "we'd like to slow the pace down a little". The audience weren't so much bemused as not bothered. The Records backing was tough but loose.

Ironically The Records' own opening set was the finest of the evening and "We aren't on Stiff", they reminded us. High duty metal pop is Will Birch's forte; commercial middle ground that owes a nod to Cheap Trick and Dwight Twilley.

Transatlantic pop is not a dirty word to Will. He likes a bit of platinum polish. The songs that he and guitarist John Wicks invent are engaging and exciting: nuggets like "Starry Eyes", "Girls That Don't Exist", "Affection Rejected", Tim Moore's "Rock And Roll Love Letter" and their killer insight into the musician's adoration of the narcissus youth cult, "Teenorama", replete with its highly applicable hook chorus. "Sugar candy is all you ever eat, you're so skinny, you're so sweet".

Rachel and her sister Leah were packed off to bed early. Rarely out of the protective custody of their tutor, they left a pile of largely unattended books in their wake and chewed great wads of sticky gum. Rachel rolled a fresh stick round her mouth as the crew from "The Old Grey Wizenod Testicle" pointed their mikes at all and sundry.

"Gee", she grimaced. "I hate classical history."

It was the bespectacled, studious Liam Sternberg who persuaded Rachel that there was life after school and that a stab in the dark with a new wave Limey company might serve her interests better than warbling the chaff the Acuff-Rose combie harvester left in its wake.

Sternberg came along for the ride to test his theories. Despite protestations that he was a very boring person (his manner of answering questions in a stilted monotone) Sternberg provided insights into the Sweet/Stiff mentality with remarkable objectivity.

Tiring of selling street corner acid to Akron's small hippy population, Liam studied composition and took the freak trail East, to Switzerland. There he backed a Detroit cabaret artist, Dee Dee McNeil.

But he yearned for London. A training in top 40 disco bar bands held him in good stead on our pub circuit. Spells with Pasha, Ginger Johnson's African Drummers, and a partnership with folkie John D. Bryant got him used to the M.I.

But he dreamed of the rubber factories of Akron and on return found a wealth of hometown talent lurking in the eternal school halls and diners of Cleveland's fair suburb.

As luck would have it Robinson, in New York looking for Devos, found himself directed towards Jane Aire and WMMS, a radio station whose diet of chart muzak was occasionally punctuated by the cries of young dissidents.

Sternberg looked glassy and began to drone: "The Stiff compilation is really a hype. Akron is only a suburb like any other mid-west town. The inhabitants aren't too proud of it, but there isn't an 'Akron sound'."

Stiff soon closed their option on Jane Aire, "an empty headed girl" according to Robinson. Rachel was

Make a sound choice. wea - The Sound Generator

If it's muggy, I must be thirsty

THIS YEAR's Weather Report is twice as nice as last year's. And doubly dodgy.

This year's "Mr Gone" album and this year's tour, summed up with two nights at Hammersmith, seem to have divided both public and private opinion. I'm in two minds myself.

A favourite band in a favourite month, the eternal Weather Report in autumnal favour, with the dry and warm "Mr Gone" furthering the mellow and fruity flavour of 1977's "Heavy Weather". It would be nice to think that the band's all weather rapport exists outside the normal and nominal paths of evolution.

And "Mr Gone" — what does that mean? — is Weather Report's eighth album, they are moving into the autumn of their career. You have to understand that it is twice as nice, that their stylisations are being tested and tried in new settings, blend not bland.

Things blur — the tension between the populist Pastorius and phlegmatic Shorter/Zawinul axis seems to move further from, rather than nearer to, conclusion. Pastorius — the Bjorn Borg of bass — has evolved a style of playing all his own (as much as any style is). An adaptable, slippery, corkscrew-harmonic technique first heard in Weather Report on their sixth album ("Black Market"), which recording saw the departure of former bassist Alphonso Johnson, whose playing was both more subtle and more savage than that of his precocious Texan replacement.

Now, Weather Report has always been made up of Wayne Shorter (saxes) and Josef Zawinul (keyboards), plus whatever rhythm section and percussionist(s) they angled for.

This year's Weather Report is rounder than it's ever been, just Zawinul/Shorter and Pastorius/Peter Erskine. Erskine is a new drummer, one of three used on the "Gone" album.

So does it maintain the traditional elements of time and tension, logic and lotion?

THIS YEAR's Jaco Pastorius solo is twice as long as last year's. And trebly troublous, twittily and torpid. The latest addition to the Pastorius arsenal is electronic manipulation/distortion — imagine Hendrix idly doodling with a bass and you're just about got it. I came away from the O.D.-con feeling that the bass was dominant, and dull, that Weather Report were not a group but agape, four individuals trying to twine and maintain rather than lighten and take-off.

I didn't think that technology (what's that?) got in the way; that is to say, I was gravely misinformed. Rather like the Great Pyramid, the structure of Weather Report might well have been designed as an illustration of a possible, perfect, evolving state — separate categories such as 'science', 'art', and 'spirit' are not separate categories!

It is a measure of some modern person's gleeful ignorance and suppression of intuitive perception that the point is missed; the structure is the essence, essence is overall, each part a whole and the end construction (composition) infinite, a colossal beginning, potential made concrete.

Which is why Zawinul once said "everybody in this group is a composer", which is why it is so unsettling to witness Pastorius' trip out into ego-jello, which is why there is perfect Weather Report music but also why a perfect or even decent Weather Report interview doesn't seem likely.

An afternoon between the two Hammersmith concerts, and I am invited to bring self and technology to lunch. Weather Report will be there, and I will perhaps be able to talk with all four members. Then again, perhaps I won't.

A pretty pastel table in a pretty posh restaurant, I introduce myself and tape recorder to Jaco Pastorius and his beautiful wife.

Food is ordered, waiters are summoned upon to deliver beer and wine, cutlery is rattled, soup curdles and muzak cuddles. Pastorius is pretty talkative. His manner is brash, his voice loud, with a distinctive Texan edge purring through clearly.

frequently making him sound not unlike an out-law enunciating past feats and footholds. He might also be, um, quite 'high', although I myself had a slight hangover — most things seemed quite extreme.

He looks up from his roast trout (cooked in almonds).

"I am a connoisseur of music — I know the best music in the world!"

What do you listen to?

"Right now? Uh... The Beatles.

Uh, I actually never listen to music. I quit listening to music eight years ago when my daughter was born, 'cause I had no time, I had to go out and work. I had no time to waste, so to say."

Do you go to concerts?

"No, I never have. The first concert I went to, I played, ha ha ha..."

Who did you ever listen to?

"The Beatles, James Brown, Frank Sinatra, Miles Davis, Igor Stravinsky, Elvis Presley — you know, the shit!"

"I STARTED off on drums, ma daddy's a drummer, ah played drums m'whole life. I never had any drums, but I played 'em — if that "I can play like Hendrix, Segovia and the entire string section of the LSO without taking off my shades and while wearing a pony tail, ya dig?"

Jaco Pastorius adopts another unassuming pose.

A brightish future is forecast for WEATHER REPORT by intrepid reporter IAN PENMAN, who takes his hangover and tape recorder to meet JACO PASTORIUS and WAYNE SHORTER. Photos by TERRY LOTT makes any sense...

Do you approach the bass as a percussion instrument at all?

"I don't approach it as anything; I let the music approach me!"

Your solo last night seemed more along the lines of a conventional guitar solo.

"Hey man! Nobody can play the bass like me! I ain't tryin' to play like a guitar — ain't no guitar player can play like me either — hell with that shit! I was just playing, man, I was just being... JACO!!! Being myself, I ain't tryin' to do anything, I ain't tryin' to accomplish anything, I'm just playing music, and if it sounds like something it sounds like it."

"You know! It's like a parable, Jesus Christ with the parable, you know it to somebody and it comes in on any level, anybody can appreciate it any way he wants to."

Do you listen to any other bass players?

"Never have."

Or guitarists?

Jimi Hendrix?

"Jimi Hendrix — I love Jimi Hendrix, but I never listen to him. I was gonna play with Hendrix and he died. I was eighteen, he was the next band I was gonna be the bass player — very few people know this. But I never listened to him that much. I just sort of experienced him — he used to come to Florida an' I used to see him and stuff."

I actually do a better Hendrix impersonation than any guitar player

That's who you sounded like last night.

"Yeah! I played 'Third Stone From The Sun' last night, that's why you thought that!"

In the studio sometimes I'll play the bass, and then I'll double it, I'll just overdub exactly what I've played note for note, and move the vibrato in the other direction, and it causes a natural phasing you know? Like, there's no way I could take a phase-shifter, like a phase-shifter is always going in a certain rhythm, and there's no way you play like that."

"So on stage we were figuring out — how the hell can we accomplish the sound, and ah, the closest thing we could find to make this sound was an MXR digital delay, which has a flanger effect I'm told."

"I mean, what it sounds like to me is like a Leslie on a Hammond B3, you know? When it's goin' slow, before you kick it in, before you kick it in a chorus? This is the effect I was looking for when I'm playing the harmonics."

"But then one night I was just standing there on stage and I just got crazy and I started fuckin' around with it — and the shit started makin' all sorts of sounds, it was unbelievable!"

"This is what happened last night. I had no idea what was gonna happen — I just started playin' man, and that was some of the prettiest music I personally ever heard man..."

During the conversation with Pastorius there are frequent interruptions — eruptions is perhaps nearer the truth — when myself, the bassist and my tape recorder break up as the result of manic impersonations and comments emanating from another nearby pretty pastel table. Sitting there is one Wayne Shorter.

In almost complete contrast to this (and to the chat with Pastorius) is the few minutes' conversation I have with Shorter before the entire band are whisked off to radio stations and glossy magazines.

Although he has sobered up massively by the time I engage his interest, Shorter will take great delight in rounding off a very serious sentence or point in the voice of some great horror movie actor. Pretty disorientating, and doubly so once transposed into the sterile dimension of pulp and print.

Suffice to say that Shorter seems to be the antithesis of the Pastorius I talked with — someone who has a quite obviously deep understanding of his own position and the position of others, both in relation to Weather Report, music, and the depth of 'commitment' it all entails, and however much of your life it demands.

Between finding your voice and vocation, and fiddling about with virtuosity? Sounds as presumptuous and contentious to me as it does to you, but it's not really that exaggerated an impression. Twice as righteous?

GET THE feeling that the elders (Zawinul and Shorter) know what's right and wrong with the current rhythm.

Pastorius may win ribbons for ricochet, but they'll just leave him be, let the crowds rush in, and maybe backout again, and know that either he'll wake himself up or go form a Monomania Orchestra of his own.

I don't think the day will come when we ask "Whatever happened to Weather Report?", and have to reply "Mister Gone up the nose..."

Wayne Shorter, tired of embarrassing questions, casts spell over Penman's tape recorder while hungry journalist eyes unfinished bread roll.

Ryan O'Neal attempts a Charlie Bronson in The Driver.

Driver's wild

The Driver

Written and Directed by Walter Hill.
Starring Ryan O'Neal,
Bruce Dern and Isabelle Adjani.
(EMI)

Sam Peckinpah recently showed in Convoy that the code of the west and the code of the road were but alternative versions of the same old morality, and it's perhaps hardly surprising that Peckinpah graduate Walter Hill (the scripted The Getaway) should concern himself with similar themes.

The setting of The Driver is Los Angeles (though it's never identified as such), and the film is a contemporary Western — a motif it's hard to miss. The cop refers throughout to his particular adversary as "the cowboy"; the latter, despite the bounty with which his chilling professional competence has surely rewarded him, leads an apparently ascetic lifestyle which allows only one luxury, a small transistor radio permanently tuned to a C&W station — "cowboy's music," as one of the characters deliberately observes.

As in Convoy also, the confrontation between law-breakers and law-enforcers is reduced to single-handed combat, a real Korchnoi v. Karpov dogfight, in which neither side earns ethical superiority.

The characters in The Driver seems to inhabit a claustrophobic, twilight world, but the cars, accelerating across the urban landscape like guided missiles, have been given the freedom of the city; and if you thought the years since Bullitt had eroded the potentialities for cinematic suspense in car chases — well, you ain't seen nothin' yet.

As the eponymous driver — the hired hand who spirits bank robbers from the scene of their crime — O'Neal, thankfully laconic, has rarely been more watchable; while as the cop, Bruce Dern — so besotted in his task that he's almost as manic as the psychopath he played in Blaci Sunday — gives another authoritative performance (Bruce is the word, indeed). There's also an appearance from Ronree Blakley, taking time out from hanging around with Bob Dylan to play the part of O'Neal's connexion.

There is however scant room for character development (or even for names) and the elliptical narrative leaves occasional loose ends, but these potential shortcomings are converted into strengths, such as the unrelenting visual drama and pace of the film. The Driver may superficially seem an unprepossessing piece of work, but it's actually a massively assured achievement. Hill is currently outgunning his mentor, for where Convoy was kids' stuff, the tautness of The Driver attests to the director's mature vision and clarity of purpose.

This is Hill's second feature (the first having been The Streetfighter with Charles Bronson: information which gives rise to a curious emotion — regret at having missed a Bronson film) and already he can be considered a potent force in contemporary cinema. The Driver will make you wish you went to the movies more often.

Accompanying it on general release is an animated short (very short — under five minutes), The Oriental Nightfish, directed by Ian Emes. It's just about worth arriving early to catch it, since the graphics, set to music by Wings, are generally very good, though the film unfortunately has little substance, and is further hampered by a voice-over from Linde McCartney.

Word Is Out

(Scale)

The prospect of getting up at 8.30 and tubing through rush hour crowds to see a two-hour film that consists solely of interviews with 26 gay people did not strike me as entirely wonderful. I half expected to be bored to tears. Well, there were tears, but not of boredom. Word Is Out is the most moving, gripping, fascinating film I've seen for ages.

One reason is that it's

exceptionally well-made. The Mariposa Film Group have chosen their interviewees, and edited the interviews, with rare sensitivity. The pacing is superb, and the emotional range of the film marvellously subtle and varied. It's also remarkably easy to watch — pleasant people being articulate in bright, decorous surroundings.

But it's what these people say that is the real heart of the film. They're from different parts of the States, from different ethnic groups and various class backgrounds, aged between the 20s and the 70s, but their common link is their homosexuality. Each has been engaged in a personal struggle to find out, accept, and simply be, whoever he or she is.

The casual openness with which they talk of their lives is captivating, as are the stories themselves. Whitney realised she was gay when she was 13. Her parents sent her to a psychiatrist, who tried to 'cure' her lesbianism by putting her on a diet of green salad! Rick Stokes had been gay for nearly ten years before his family found out. They pressured him into seeing a doctor, who told him "Well, we could castrate you, but let's try some treatment and cure you that way." His 'cure' was a course of electric shock treatment, which Rick describes as "absolute hell." Time after time, there are glimpses of the nonchalant savagery and ignorance with which the straight world treat gays. But there is no preaching, no rhetoric. And Word Is Out is by no means a heavy film. It's frequently hilarious, and its spirit is essentially optimistic. It's a very encouraging film, not just for gays, but for all people who're trying to work out their own lives.

What makes it so riveting, and so subversive, is that these are real people simply telling the truth about their own lives. They found the strength and the courage to come out and be what they are, and the film implies that everybody has that same power to make of their lives what they will. Go to it, all you closet revolutionaries.

Shipwreck!

Written and Directed by Stewart Raffill.
Starring Robert Logan and Mikki Jameson-Olsen.
(Columbia-Warner)

It was a hot day in a cool office. The phone squeaked and I left it, see. Catch Shipwreck! 6.30 at Warners. OK.

Fifteen minutes into the movie. I was early. The only tomato on the screen was the Kelly dame (Mikki Jameson-Olsen — a tough one to pronounce, to watch tougher). She's this clean photo-journalist who's along for kicks on a sail voyage with a young widower and his two kids.

I'd guessed right. It was Disney, sort of. A family movie anyways. Enough animals to sink Staten Island.

A loudmouth Negro kid called Jesse something (Cjon Dametri Patterson — cute name, huh?) is found stowed away amongst all these Hill I'm shipwrecked!

Caucasians. The whole act gets shipwrecked and they stall for rescue in Alaska. There's no TV or people in that neck of the woods, but they'd taken along some stuff. A transistor radio with no appetite for batteries, lots of make up and hair conditioner, the usual — and some good old-fashioned American optimism.

Rescue looks likely as the Yankees dumping the World series, so they build a boat. A big, sore Kodiak bear chases them but they launch this boat and leave bigfoot on the beach like a sap. A US coastguard vessel pulls up on cue like some waiter's sleeve and Travis, the daddy, asks Kelly to marry him.

A cute story. And slick, but easy as a solo bourbon. The Alaskan air and the adventure and the checked shirts made me think about summer camp. So I bit down on my micronite filter.

SINGLES OF THE WEEK

ALICIA BRIDGES: I Love The Nightlife (Polydor)
THE VELVETTES: Needle In A Haystack (Motown)

Against all odds (male songwriters mostly, popularity and peak public consumption, being The Rave, prettiness), there's a million times as many spunky, predatory, faithful girls to be found in disco / soul than in any lousy, liberated white rock. Disco girls wear stilettoes, they are street-smart and want to dance, and want one boyfriend to be true and if he isn't, well, screw you Mac.

"Loving lies just bring me down / When you've got women all over town / You can love them all and when you're through / Maybe that'll make-huh!! — a man outa you," growls the magnificent Alicia Bridges, fending off universal insincere, mawkish man. I'll never love a black girl singer's song the way I do "Shame", but this will always be the King's close second; totally ordinary mid-tempo beat and tune transformed into the realms of radio-fantasy by Alicia's brilliantly cool, hedonistic sentiments and gritty, Martha-Vandella type voice.

Like "Shame" before it, this is a massive American hit; disco seems to be the only thing the Americans are more intelligent than us about. Please, please, this is a great record — don't bother that it's disco and you hate disco, you should buy it and make Alicia Bridges rich and happy and famous for writing and delivering unto us a creature like this.

1964, 1967, 1972 — and now The Velvettes masterpiece (written, incidentally, by Norman Whitfield, who's currently writing great, sympathetic songs for Gwen of Rose Royce and the three Stargard girls to get across to you) is waiting in the shops for you for the fourth time, out from a "superior master tape". Tinnier than I remembered it, but that only works for its charm like all the Orions technically-terrible stuff: a tinny production stresses the treble and polarises the bass-thump and the high-sound, making it even more of a girls' record.

DREADFUL DISCO

RICK JAMES: Mary Jane (Motown)
M. J. WILLIAMS: Only Your Love Can Save Me Now (Ariola)
TIMMY THOMAS: Freak In, Freak Out (T.K.)
CAROL DOUGLAS: Burnin' (Midwest)
GRACE KENNEDY: Fever (D.M.)
MADLEEN KANE: C'est Si Bon (Decca)
COLORADO: California Dreaming (Pinnacle)
BACIOTTI: Black Jack (Carrere)
HIGH ENERGY: Lovin' Fever (Motown).

Appalling disco records, the kind that would give the genre a bad name — if only it didn't have one already, if only disco-haters were intelligent enough to accept individual records on their individual merits.

People react to disco ridiculously these days, either screaming that anyone who likes any disco record should have their brains sucked out, or going completely overboard and lapping up anything with a beat (hi, Jean-Claude de Gay News.) Anyway, here's some real crap for you all to love or hate.

"smooch" aimed at people so ugly they shouldn't be allowed to: M.J. Williams follows up "I Found Love On The Disco Floor" (like love was a contact-lens or summat) with another mid-tempo Biddo nothing — the only good work Biddo ever did was Tine Charles early stuff.

Colorado assassinate The Mamas And Papas' fey, gorgeous classic with oodles of dumb Trattoria guitars and a Silver Convention impersonator; it's so bad that they deserve to lose their lousy lives in an earthquake. "I'd be dead and buried / If I was in L.A. / California earthquake / On such a winter's day" — now that would be a disc worth spinning, tee hee. Sung in sloppy hick-speak, with not even that boring German precision to recommend it to certain pretentious segments of the population; probably Spanish or Italian.

Yes, I look at the label hard and it is Italian. Dumb wops, they probably reckon Colorado's the capital of California.

Black Jack are almost exactly like Space, who had that hit with "Magic Fly", and who I used to have great fun making up self-fulfilling prophecies about a good 18 months ago before Stigwood and the rest of you sheep ever knew disco was big news.

Space were a Carrere act, too — in fact I reckon it is Space, because they never showed their face (makes it easier to change.) This would be a tolerable record were it not for that totally unnecessary male lead voice, so butch and rock-influenced and raunchy and amateur — full of it's non-self, completely cancelling out the tuneful, isolated, expert backing track.

Latest girl to flirt with fake-Fever is Grace Kennedy, this time reviving the old Peggy Lee torch. The disgusting Little Nell did the same a while back in jaundiced-yellow vinyl for Ric readers to fall over their club-feet too.

Grace also discoses it, but straight, no ickle-old-girl ham or fashion aides. Grace Kennedy (fascinating name, calculated to break a girl on the U.S. market, Kelly and Jackie O. being the only girls to live the American Dream and marry the Fairytale Prince) is pretty, has a fine, cool voice and a chic way of phrasing but this is a boring, over-cooked song that would make Evelyn King sound boring.

Madleen Kane is a 19-year-old ex-fashion model who, unlike many tacky disco-sex blondes (Andrea True, La Belle Epoque, Amanda Lear), is really beautiful-high-fashion with masses of snub-nosed popular appeal. She should stick to looking luscious for a living, being an abominable disco-whisperer; when she sighs "C'est Si Bon" in her guttural Swedish accent, she makes it sound like "Cess Pool." A slowie, ultra-sluggish, Donne Summer is great, but I reckon she always sounds cold; Madleen makes her sound multi-organic.

I have always found Carol Douglas's work entirely resistable and this is the same as all those I was indifferent to, though apparently growing well in the United States. Standard mid-tempo plod, it rips along jerkily, with Miss Douglas as always sounding alternately like Toni Tenille's disco alter-ego and Tony Tenille's mother.

"Get freaky with me!" squeal a bunch of the asinine disco-chick-voices you all (however ignorant) thought got pensioned off a long time ago, as the intro to the new Timmy Thomas record. To a backing track of shouting, laughing and partying, Timmy intones; "Freak on, freak on, freak in, freak out". Disgusting stoned hippie disco News Of The World-speak disco if ever they wanted to show how Locarno has corrupted and softened the nation's youth.

"Girl and boys and women and men / Freaking out and freakin' in!!" Timmy Thomas made a good record once, a long time ago.

High Energy (five pretty young black girls) are being groomed as Three Degrees (three pretty old black girls). (Unfortunately, they don't even sound cynical that exuberantly.)

At one time I would have compared girls to Three Degrees as a compliment; never mind, this is boring, the girls sound bored, the production is slick. Motown is gone, a lost cause. High Energy try to sound enthusiastic about being all-round surrogates but fail. Up-tempo nothing.

Ah ha!! Now all you narrow creeps can't accuse me of loving disco per se, because I loathe these disco records as much as I despise those cretins who say "Oh, disco, shit for morons."

CROSS GIRLS

LYNSEY DE PAUL: Hollywood Romance (Polydor)
LULU: Don't Take Love For Granted (Rocket)
ELKIE BROOKS: Don't Cry Out Loud (A&M)
JULIE COVINGTON: (I Want To See The) Bright Lights (Virgin)
BETTE MIDLER: Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy (Atlantic.)

Covington sings rocky horror in butch, strident voice, just dying to be a whiney protest singer complete with twee guitar solo etc. Despite telly semi-success, Covington is still completely charm-free and reeking of fringe-theatre. You can take the girl off the campus, but she'll always be cramming her preps, over-educated and uninspired.

You really should have taken that role in Evita, dear.

Lulu's song sounds like a reconciling mating-call to old Momo, a mopey, self-pitying slowie in the tradition of "How Deep Is Your Love" with backing vocals identical to current Bee Gees ones.

Elkie Brooks is one of these ageing theatricals like Maddy Prior and Maggie Bell who swear eternal loyalty to the college / pub / folk circuit and then run screaming for the sequins and schmalz as soon as there's the slightest chance they could be groomed to mild success on the cabaret round.

Here Elk has chosen a typically slow and twee Carol Bayer Sager song to do her Edith Piaf impersonations to, putting a ridiculous, trilling vibrato into her voice to make herself sound French. She probably reckons she sounds all tasteful and chic. Horrific. The most horrified you can be outside of the London Dungeon.

Bette Midler is so horribly 1973-camp that she should stick to shocking and delighting one's parents on prime-time TV in person, Bette will always be years ahead of Man Tran and whoever, being by design and nature and physique a great comedienne (though only as good as her gag-writers, naturally); on record she's a flat punch-line, especially on this loud, brassy rendition of the old Someone's Sisters hit wherein her voice is indiscernable from those of her Staggering Harlettes.

What was the joke again, Bette? (That I'm multi-tracked on this one, dear — Bette)

Lynsey De Paul had one of the most invidious, ingenious, successful, crossover / sell-out careers of the early '70s, hideously under-studied by the rock press — shema. If ever there was a cool-headed girl... still, it's all gone now, those barriers broken by a walking beauty-spot, those glam parodies and all markets covered, and Lynsey's as boring as any other smart blonde who moves out to Hollywood.

IS CAPABLE OF GREAT THINGS: MUST TRY HARDER

OLIVIA NEWTON-JOHN: Hopelessly Devoted To You (Polydor)
JUDIE TZUKE: For You (Rocket)

Though I think Grease is easily the most magical musical since Oklahoma! (if those "Summer Nights" and "You're The One That I Went" routines don't get you all wet-eyed in awe, put your name down on Christian Bernard's waiting-list) and that old Olivia has made the transition from chanteuse to actress with as much grace as anyone has ever mustered, this is wet rubbish, very much in the vein of Travolta's "Sandy."

I think John and Olivia should get married, or at least take a vow only to cut singles together; alone, they almost deserve the abuse currently coming at them from over-14's all across the land.

Judie Tzuke's gorgeous happy-sad little song (released yet again) shimmers away accapella for all it's worth; beautiful, honest and sophisticated until — yeuchhh!! — those awful chamber-pot-music violins break out like eczema all over the gem. You shouldn't have bothered, Judie you really shouldn't.

ADAM AND THE ANTS: Young Parisians (Decca).

Tee hee hee, Adam, and you too credibility-Sioux, didn't we tell you you'd have to drop all your swastika japes before any record company would touch you, dears? Now you're all falling over yourself to play R.A.R. gigs and dedicate songs to famous anti-Nazis, so wasn't it an expensive waste of time to dress up like Germans in the first place?

I was at least expecting to be unfashionably offended by Adam's first fab 45 waxing but all I could do was blush and giggle at the lyrics; "Young Parisians are so French at the Champs Elysees" — too subtle for my brash intellect, I reckon. Instrumentally and lyrically reminds one of nothing so much as Queen in their typically-tennis English innocents abroad phase. Adam resembles Horace the Crackerjack! puppet, has spent too long alone in his room and will soon go blind.

A SINGLE MAN

The ELTON JOHN Interview by ROY CARR

JUST AFTER the release of "Tumbleweed Connection", Elton John was approached in the Speakeasy Club one evening by Jeff Beck, who asked to join Elton's band.

For the next week, they rehearsed solidly. Enter Beck's manager, who suggested that the guitarist should receive 90 per cent of the take and Elton the remaining 10.

Enter Dick James who was then acting on behalf of Elton John and who, to the pianist's chagrin, immediately scrapped such a one-sided deal.

"Within nine months," James insisted, "Elton will be earning 15,000 dollars a night". And nine months later his prophecy came true.

As regards visiting the States, our budding megastar was not keen. He was more concerned with establishing himself in Europe — and his only motivation to play the Troubadour in LA was to satisfy his vinyl junkie fixation by visiting the world-famous Tower Records supermarket.

But within 10 days of his opening date, he was known coast-to-coast, returning soon after for a full-scale tour as a headliner.

"My success," admits Elton, "was a freak. I was just the right person in the right place at the right time."

He emerged as the most popular solo recording artist since Elvis Presley, a media personality who became more newsworthy for his extravagant appearance than for his undoubted musical ability.

"When I had a hair transplant it reached such ludicrous proportions that — on the day Bob Dylan played to over 250,000 fans at Blackbushe — The Sun put a photograph of me without a hat on the front page, and only gave Dylan, who'd just played to the biggest ever audience in this country, about four column inches somewhere inside."

By 1975, Elton John's professional career had turned sour on him and after much soul-searching he announced his retirement from the stage.

But now, having temporarily severed his working relationship with lyricist Bernie Taupin to collaborate with Gary Osborne, Elton John finds that his new album "A Single Man" once again finds him poised at a crucial crossroad in his career.

"In the past I've often neglected my singing. On this new album and, especially on 'It Ain't Gonna Be Easy', I've sung far better than I've ever sung in my entire life."

After the comparative commercial failure of his last album ("Blue Moves") and an artistically daring single, "Ego", he's optimistic about his new album.

"If it does flop", he states, "I'll be very disappointed, but I won't be destroyed. In the past, if something failed I could put it down to other things, to other people; this time it's really all down to me."

Unlike other megastars, Elton John didn't become a tax exile; he remained in Britain, channeling both his energies and a considerable amount of finance into Watford Football Club. As the club's chairman, he has seen Watford rise to a position where — on their present form — they could be promoted from the Third into the Second Division.

Possibly one of the few genuine Good Guys in the music business, Elton John lives near Windsor surrounded by arguably the most comprehensive private record collection in Britain and some beautiful works of art. He keeps open house. He welcomes visitors with genuine hospitality. His home is not a shrine to expensive bad taste.

"I've really had to struggle for what I've got out of life", he reflects, "but when I look back on it now, I honestly enjoyed those early days working for a miserable £15 a week with Bluesology. In retrospect they weren't the bad times I imagined them to be at the time."

Undoubtedly the most enthusiastic fan in the business, Elton John champions the cause of other musicians as vigorously as he approaches his own career.

For the first time in well over two years, he has agreed to give an interview. And for the very first time has spoken openly about both his private and professional life.

Elton John reclines on the leather couch... Roy Carr files a report.

RC: Over the last year or so you have made a number of statements that have garnered a great deal of headline press. Like when you received Capital Radio's Award for the Best Male Singer you said it should have gone to Elvis Costello. Did you mean that?

EJ: I felt guilty afterwards, because those awards come from the fans, but I really hadn't done anything during that year to warrant it. I hadn't put out any new product. I honestly felt that of all the people who had emerged Elvis Costello was the most important — by far the best songwriter and the best recordmaker. It seemed a bit farcical for me to pick up the award. I was genuinely shocked. Sure, I knew I must stand a chance in the Best London Concert category, but as far as the Best Male Singer was concerned, me winning it was a bit unfair.

Over the last couple of years most established artists have been extremely guarded in viewing their opinions of newcomers like Elvis Costello or The Sex Pistols, and some have been downright patronising. But you have been most enthusiastic in your support.

Yeah, and I still get all the shit slung at me.

Sure, but not as much as, say, The Rolling Stones, The Who and in particular Rod Stewart.

I think I have, but generally it doesn't worry me. I think that what has happened over the last year and a half has been one of the best things that's happened to the industry in years. It's very healthy. The first time I saw The Sex Pistols was on the Janet Street-Porter London Weekend Show. I was sitting up in bed watching television and suddenly I really felt old... fuckin' hell, I thought, what the hell's going on? I wasn't frightened by it, but I was a little perturbed.

Why? Because suddenly here was something very new and very exciting. It was a good programme. The guy they interviewed from the 100 Club said it was something new that the kids were creating for themselves, not something new that the record industry was creating... and I feel very strongly about the industry creating monsters, dictating what people buy.

After listening to Costello and The Stranglers and artists like that, I felt it has proved extremely healthy. I also think some aspects are very comical. Anyone who gets dressed up like so many new bands do — tie both legs together and run for a bus — has my full approval.

Well, there have been persistent rumours that President Carter's administration applied pressures on the American record industry to keep the new wave in check.

It's strange. I'm surprised that the Costello and Stranglers records haven't made more impact in the States than they have.

As far as Costello is concerned, they chose a good single, "Alison", but nothing really happened. It's such a great song that I seriously considered covering it myself.

However, there is a certain amount of prejudice against new British acts at the moment; they're highly suspicious of things that have proved successful outside of America.

I know that Costello and The Stranglers have done U.S. tours but the only way you're gonna break big over there is to tour constantly for three or four years and that's why, after ELO, Thin Lizzy are going to be the next Big British Band and the best of luck to 'em.

Ian Dury has probably got one of the best road bands but I don't feel he stands too much chance Stateside. I've never seen him live, only on TV, and I don't mean this remark to be derogatory to anyone, but I hope Dury doesn't end up being like Joe Brown... a professional cockney.

You spoke about the record industry creating monsters. Did you ever feel that you were ever in danger of becoming such a monster? I mean, at one time it was said you accounted for two per cent of all world record sales?

I think that figure was exaggerated. I don't know who came up with that statistic or where they got it from.

Anyway, things like that go in circles. When I came off the road, it was Fleetwood Mac and Peter Frampton who were the big international record sellers, now it's The Bee Gees. I

Do you feel that being a loner has something to do with the fact that you were an only child?

Definitely. I was terribly upset that I was an only child... especially when my father, who didn't want any more children, re-married and had four kids in four years. That completely destroyed me. To be honest, I think my childhood has had a terrible influence on what I am, on what I think, on what I do and what I'm trying to fight my way out of.

Just how important to your peace of mind is your professional career now?

Still very important, because I'm a musician and a good one at that, and therefore I feel I still have a lot more to give. It's just a matter of re-evaluating my life. Music is still important, but selling oneself at a price isn't. Once you've attained success you reach a crossroad and you have to be totally honest, and I feel that's what "Ego" was all about. Re-evaluating one's career may happen three or four times in an artist's professional lifetime. And you have to accept that certain things haven't sold as well as others and that other artists have come up in your place, and that's the kind of healthy attitude that you've got to take.

Part of your initial success was your visual appeal. You represented the fans who went to all the gigs. You were the first megastar that made it acceptable not to be snake-bitten and emaciated.

Of all the people who made it in the last decade, I was the least expected because I've never represented what a typical rock star is supposed to be. Furthermore, I got away with it because there were so many kids who could identify with me. Sure, they would have all loved to have looked like Keith Richards and live the life he leads, but I gave them some kinda hope.

But let's put one thing straight, I'm not as bankable in this country as I used to be. Over the last couple of years I've had a one-off hit single with Kiki Dee — which, as it happens, was my first chart-topper over here — released "Blue Moves" which wasn't a fantastic success and a flop single. There's no getting away from it, my popularity has slumped record-wise, but I realise it.

I'd like to take your career back a few years to that time when you and John Lennon had a mutual admiration society going. Did you ever collaborate on any original material?

Actually, I never entered my mind — though I was responsible for getting John and Yoko back together again. I've hardly seen them since the baby was born, even though I was the godfather. But I'd love to work with John again because it was such a fabulous experience... he's such a nice person.

With regard to your songwriting, haven't you ever wanted to write both words and music?

I've done quite a few things on the new album — thought up the titles and contributed four or five lines here and there.

Before, it was always Bernie Taupin putting the words in your mouth.

Words first, the music later. This time around the music came first and Gary Osborne wrote the lyrics around the melodies after we'd discussed precisely what we wanted each song to be about.

But surely you would like to express yourself through the lyrics of your songs?

If I wrote the lyrics for an album — which I'm sure I will eventually do — it might come out very raw and very crude when I'd want it to sound intelligent. Also I'm quite positive it would be extremely bitter.

Why?

Well, I'm in a funny position professionally. The things I'd say in my lyrics would probably shock a lot of people and they'd probably assume that I'd gone mental. Just things like discrimination, censorship... I'd love to write songs attacking people like Mary Whitehouse. I'd also like to write obscene songs, like using swear words which, in many instances, is essential to put across certain attitudes.

Are you then excited and stimulated by the everyday street vocabulary that bands like Sham 69 and The Sex Pistols use in many of their songs?

Very much so... but the record that I did like was Wayne County's "If You Don't Want To Fuck Me, Fuck Off".

That really made me laugh. But I've got myself into a position where I've got to be very careful about what I do. I'm responsible to a great many people, especially in my job as chairman of Watford Football Club. One has to be aware that if I recorded that kind of material I would upset a great many people in the town of Watford. On the other hand, as an artist I don't want to be forced to make such compromises.

You feel that in the past you have had to make artistic compromises?

No, not since I've been at Watford, but if I did make a very bitter and controversial album like the one I had in mind... this is very difficult.

I'm very aware that a lot of people at the club look towards me for guidance and I really enjoy that and I'm having such a good time that I never want to ruin it. My way of helping the people of Watford is to try and make things better for them. To build a new stadium which can also be used as a community centre.

In that sense, though I've never voted in my life, I've suddenly become politically minded.

After all these years, the government have only just started making grants to clubs to make sure that they've got facilities so that the actual community can use them. And, that's terribly important, because as far as I'm concerned, sport is just as important... perhaps even more so than music.

Not every kid can play a guitar but there are hundreds of thousands who can apply their talents to various sports activities and therefore they must be encouraged because in Britain sport and football clubs are run on an archaic Victorian class-based level.

It's them and us — like the directors and the supporters never talk to one another. And that's disgraceful. In fact most boards of directors don't care about their supporters. They despise them.

But to return to the question, I have this responsibility to the people of Watford since I often represent them at various council meetings where I have a good relationship. Now if I came out with a highly controversial album, I'd have to think what the fuck are they going to think? It's very tricky position. I really don't know if I have the strength to overcome what might transpire.

But surely your artistic commitment should be divorced from your social obligations?

Of course they should, but unfortunately, most people don't think that way.

Do you think if you'd written a song like "Glad To Be Gay", it would have been accepted?

You mean, I'm a pooft, troll-de-roll! I don't know. Returning to the question of writing my own lyrics... there's a lot of things I want to say, but it's just a question of gaining momentum and collecting my thoughts. I'm just disgusted that people build up preconceived ideas about things and it's their parents' faults, because from a very early age they're inbred with a bias or a hatred against something or somebody.

Is this partnership with Gary Osborne a one-off?

I intend to work again with Gary and, depending upon his reaction to this album, to collaborate again with Taupin, but he might be dreadfully upset because there's not one track of his on the new album. He'll probably feel extremely hurt but it'll give him a much-needed kick up the arse.

But when success almost gives you a license to print your own money, and you can perform to crowds like those who came to the LA Dodgers Stadium, it must turn your head.

I was ecstatic about the Dodgers shows, because only two weeks prior to that event I'd been in bed after dropping 85 ten-strength valiums and I didn't think that I'd ever perform again. Yet, it was the most magical gig I've ever done.

Funnily, I can remember things from five or six years back but can't distinguish or identify with what I did from year to year. Of late the only year I can recognise is 1975: though it was a great year on stage, personally it was one great disaster.

What caused that?

I was in love with someone who didn't love me and, being very foolish, attempted to pursue it for a year. As a result I caused that person a great deal of misery, caused myself a great deal of misery and in retrospect was terribly immature about the whole situation.

That's why I swallowed 85 valiums in my hotel room, went up to the pool where my mother and grandmother were sitting and said, "Well, that's it. I've ended it all. I've taken 85 valiums."

And my Mom replied, "I better get my case and fuck off home! Not one ounce of sympathy, which was the right attitude for her to take, because I wanted someone to show concern. I replied: "You're not supposed to say that, you're supposed to take me in your arms!"

But my parents were great. It was the best thing that she could have said. I was so full of self-pity that I don't know how I ever got through that "Rock Of The Westies" tour. I was the thinnest I've ever been in my life and practically on my death-bed.

So the press reports that you had made suicide attempts were correct?

I'm talking about the second occasion. The first time was when I tried to gas myself a few years back. That's what "Someone Saved My Life" was all about.

So what would you have done if, after swallowing the valiums, nobody had taken any notice?

I'd have called the doctor. I'm too much of a coward to take it through to the end. As it is, I was in a coma for three days and I regret what I did. Because, even though she took it very lightly, it did hurt my mother. It was a very selfish thing to do and I'd never attempt it again. I was an immature little schoolboy craving attention on a totally different level than what I was getting as Elton John.

Is it a self-destructive streak?

Must be... but I'm not self-destructive and in many other aspects. Like with Watford. I want to get positive things done. My only self-destructive streak concerns my personal life.

The trouble is that the music business has become just that — a business. It's become the domain of the lawyer and the accountant, and in most cases

The Jam Sell Out

THE JAM All Mod Cons (Polydor)

Third albums generally mean that it's shut-up-or-get-out time: when an act's original momentum has drained away and they've got to cover the distance from a standing start, when you've got to cross "naive charm" off your list of assets.

For The Jam, it seemed as if the Third Album Syndrome hit with their second album. "This Is The Modern World" was dull and confused, lacking both the raging, one-dimensional attack of their first album and any kind of newly-won maturity. A couple of vaguely duff singles followed and, in the wake of a general disillusionment with the Brave New Wave World, it seemed as if Paul Weller and his team were about to be swept under the carpet.

Well, it just goes to show you never can tell. "All Mod Cons" is the third Jam album to be released (it's actually the fourth Jam album to be recorded; the actual third Jam album was judged, found wanting and scrapped) and it's not only several light years ahead of anything they've done before but also the album that's going to catapult The Jam right into the front rank of international rock and roll; one of the handful of truly essential rock albums of the last few years.

The title is more than Grade 8 punning or a clever-clever linkup with the nostalgibuzz packaging (like the target design on the label, the Swinging London trinketry, the Lambretta diagram or the immediate-style lettering); it's a direct reference to both the broadening of musical idiom and Weller's reaffirmation of a specific Mod consciousness.

Remember the Mod ideal: it was a lower-middle and working-class consciousness that stressed independence, fun and fashion without loss of integrity or descent into elitism or consumerism; unself-conscious solidarity and a dollop of non-sectarian concern for others. Weller has transcended his original naivety without becoming cynical about anything other than the music business.

Mod became hippies and we know that didn't work; the more exploratory end of Mod rock became psychedelia. Just as Weller's Mod ideal has abandoned the modern equivalent of besch-fighting and competitive posing, his Mod musical values have moved from '65 to '66: the intoxicating period between pill-popped guitar-strangling and "Sergeant Pepper." Reference points: "Rubber Soul" and "A Quick One" rather than "Small Faces" and "My Generation".

Still, though Weller's blends of acoustic and electric 6 and 12-string guitars, sound effects, overdubs and more careful structuring and arranging of songs (not to mention a quantum leap in standard of composition) may cause frissons of delight over at the likes of Bomp, Trouser Press and other covans of ageing Yankee Anglophiles, "All Mod Cons" is an album based firmly in 1978 and looking forward.

This is the modern world: "Down In The Tube Station At Midnight" is a fair indication of what Weller's up to on this album, as was "A Bomb In Wardour Street" (I can't help thinking that he's given more hard clear-eyed consideration to the implications of the Sham Army than Jimmy Pursey has), but they don't remotely tell the whole story. For one thing, Weller has the almost unique ability to write love songs that convince the listener that the singer is really in love. Whether he's going well or badly, he writes with a penetrating, committed insight that rings perfectly, utterly true.

Weller writes lovingly and (choke on it) sensitively without ever descending to the patented sentimentality that is the stock-in-trade of the emotionally bankrupt. That sentimentality is but the reverse side of the macho coin, and both sides spell lovelessness. The inclusion of "English Rose" (a one-man pick'n'moon acoustic number backed only by a tape of the sea) is both a musical and emotional finger in the eye for everyone who still clings to the old punk tough-guy stereotype and is prepared to call The Jam out for not doing likewise.

Weller is — like Bruce Springsteen — tough enough not to feel he needs to prove it any more, strong enough to break down his own defences, secure enough to make himself vulnerable. The consciousness of "All Mod Cons" is the most admirable in all of British rock and roll, and one that most of his one-time peers could do well to study.

Through the album, then: the brief, brusque title track and its immediate successor ("To Be Someone") examine the rock business, first in a tart V-sign to some entrepreneurial type who wishes to squeeze the singer dry and then throw him away, and second in a cuttingly ironic track about a superstar who lost touch with the kids and blew his career. Weller is, by implication, assuring his listeners that no way is that going to happen to him: but the song is so well thought out and so convincing that it chokes back the instinctive "Oh yeah?" that a less honest song in the same vein would elicit from a less honest band.

From there we're into "Mr Clean", an attack on the complacent middle-aged "professional classes." The extreme violence of its language (the nearest this album comes to an orthodox punk stance, in fact) is matched with music that combines delicacy and aggression with an astonishing command of dynamics. This is as good a place as any to point out that bassist Bruce Foxton and drummer Rick Buckler are more than equal to the new demands that Weller is making on them: the vitality, empathy and resourcefulness that they display throughout the album makes "All Mod Cons" a collective triumph for The Jam as well as a personal triumph for Weller.

"David Watts" follows (written by Ray Davies, sung by Foxton and a re-recorded improvement on the 45) with "English Rose" in hot pursuit. The side ends with "In The Crowd", which places Weller dazed and confused in the supermarket. It bears a superficial thematic resemblance to "The Combine" (from the previous album) in that it places its protagonist in a crowd and examines his reactions to the situation, but its musical and lyrical sophistication smashes "The Combine" straight back to the stone age. It ends with a lengthy, hallucinatory backward guitar solo which sounds as fresh and new as anything George Harrison or Pete Townshend did a dozen years ago, and a reference back to "Away From The Numbers."

"Billy Hunt", whom we meet at the beginning of the second side, is not a visible envy-focus like Davies' "David Watts", but the protagonist's faintly ludicrous all-powerful fantasy self: what he projects in the day dreams that see him through his crappy job. The deliberate naivety of this fantasy is caught and projected by Weller with a skill that is nothing short of marvellous.

A brace of love songs follow: "It's Too Bad" is a song of regret for a couple's mutual inability to save a relationship which they both know is infinitely worth saving. Musically, it's deliciously, wonderfully '66 Beat Groupish in a way that represents exactly what all those tinpot powerpop bands were aiming for but couldn't manage. Lyrically, even if this sort of song was Weller's only lick, he'd still be giving Pete Shelley and all his New Romance fandangos a real run for his money.

"Fly" is an exquisite electric/acoustic construction, a real lovers' song, but from there on in the mood changes for the "Doctor Marten's Apocalypse" of "A Bomb In Wardour Street" and "Tube Station". In both these songs, Weller depicts himself as the victim who doesn't know why he's getting trashed at the hands of people who don't know why they feel they have to hand out the aggro.

We've heard a lot of stupid, destructive songs about the alleged joys of violence lately and they all stink: if these songs are listened to in the spirit in which they were written then maybe we'll see a few less pictures of kids getting carried off the terraces with darts in their skulls. And if these songs mean that one less meaningless street fight gets started then we'll all owe Paul Weller a favour.

The Jam brought us The Sound Of '65 in 1976, and now in 1978 they bring us the sound of '66. Again, they've done it such a way that even though you can still hear The Who here and there and a few distinct Beatisms in those ornate descending 12-string chord sequences, it all sounds fresher and newer than anything else this year. "All Mod Cons" is the album that'll make Bob Harris' ears bleed the next time he asks what has Britain produced lately; more important, it'll be the album that makes The Jam real contenders for the crown.

Look out, all you rock and rollers: as of now The Jam are the ones you have to beat.

JOE COCKER
Luxury You Can Afford (Asylum)

Joe Cocker is rock's most impassioned singer, a man with the gift for turning trite little songs into emotional epics.

It's now more than 10 years since he gave The Beatles' "With A Little Help From My Friends" the benefit of his treatment, and the intervening decade has not always been kind to Mr. Cocker.

A mixture of personal problems and inept choice of material put his career in the doldrums. Cocker's last album "Stingray", now two years old, was the first sign of a comeback, with its glorious version of Dylan's "The Man In Me" and Bobby Charles' "The Jealous Kind".

This new set fulfils that album's promise. Once again, the finest moments are the ballads, but don't let that put you off. Cocker sings love songs like no one else, with a gritty integrity that transcends the most maudlin lyric and the schmaltziest melody.

A cut called "Lady Put The Light Out" by Guy Fletcher and Doug Plett provides the opportunity for a poignant virtuoso performance. Cocker, of course, is no perfectionist and misses almost as many notes as he hits. It's the power and the anguish in his voice that gives material like this such depth.

He even lends meaning to the nonsensical lyrics of "A Whiter Shade Of Pale", a song that would previously have seemed impossible to cover successfully.

Throughout this album, he's given the sensitive support of producer Allen Toussaint and musicians of exquisite taste like Cornell Dupree, Steve Gadd and Richard Tee. The least successful bits are up-tempo knees-ups like Toussaint's own "Fun Time" and Dylan's "Watching The River Flow".

Cocker's forte is romancing, not ranting, and there's plenty of that here to confirm his renewed stature.

GENYA RAVAN
Urban Desire (20th Century Fox)JENNY DARREN
Queen Of Fools (DJM)

Genya Ravan is Goldie Zelkowitz of Goldie and the Gingerbreads, and later of Ten Wheel Drive. After a stint at producing she's back with a new solo album that's little short of magnificent.

A few tracks inhabit the same inner city wastelands as Bruce Springsteen's work, but Genya eschews his romanticism for a toughly realistic appraisal of the hassles that come down at the dark end of the alley. "The Sweetest One", a wry look at the hustlers and the drunks, deliberately undercuts the glamorisation of poverty, as does "Aye Co'lorado", on which Lou Reed guests as a Puerto Rican hit man.

The best track, though, "Jerry's Pigeons" — an instant classic — admits to a nostalgia for teenage street life in typical Springsteen fashion, right down to the allusions to The Crystals and The Shirelles.

Other tracks are concerned simply with love and sex. The gloriously sweaty R&B of "The Night Ain't Long Enough", a fiercely joyful version of Holland-Dozier-Holland's "Back In My Arms Again" and the dramatic "Shot In The Heart" are celebrations, while the rest of the album recounts the pain, need and desolation that come in their wake. The closing "Shadowboxing" is an epic of survival with traces of "Fool To Cry" in the tune, and Genya's rasping vocals on a lurid tale of violence and betrayal.

What makes the album work so well is the utter conviction of the music. She sings from the heart throughout, and receives excellent support from her band — a monster rhythm section, two cruising guitars and some brilliant slippin' and slidin' piano.

Genya Ravan produced the album herself, and co-wrote three of the songs. Her experience and authority ooze from every groove. "Urban Desire" is stamped with a rare passion and strength, a record to be proud of.

Not so Jenny Darren's "Queen Of Fools". I once read a review which made the amazing claim "Jenny Darren has balls". And it seems to be the fate of every female rocker to be tarred with the epithet "ballyhoo": a situation which reflects our wonderful culture's curious idea that the expression of a tough, aggressive sexuality is the sole preserve of the male.

The great English language doesn't even have a word for a female equivalent of "ballyhoo", and one spin-off of this is that ladies who have a powerful voice — unless they have a powerful personality to match — tend to be moulded by male songs and male producers into precisely this "ballyhoo" category, and so end up coming over as a distorted mirror-image of male machismo.

So "Queen Of Fools". Most of the tracks are written by Geoff Gill and Cliff Wade, who produce and arrange the album, and play in the backing band. The music is a series of heavy rock clichés, occasionally leavened by syrupy strings, tossed in I presume to demonstrate Jenny Darren's "versatility".

In fact, she screams, moans, boasts and slurs her words in a blatantly manufactured style, allowing no glimpse of real individuality or emotion. Her level of political awareness (and that of her songwriters) is indicated by titles such as "Lay Me Like A Lady".

The result is an album that is totally hackneyed, completely impersonal, and immensely dull.

BARCLAY JAMES HARVEST
XII (Polydor)

Poop go the wizened wastrels! The starchy, clammy curtain rises once again, and here they are, still waiting.

Vladimir and Estragon? The Boomtown Rats? Jefferson Starship? The Conservative Party annual conference?

"I'm hitting the road to going nowhere/Got no place to go/I'm stuck inside my generation/Round and round I go..."

Not Keith Joseph but Barclay James Harvest. "XII", 1978, and the '60s are as groovy as ever they were, eh!

"Lovin' is easy with both eyes closed/You know that's the best way to feel it/Lovin' is easy with both eyes closed/Just get a hold and watch how it goes."

You're buying a stairway to heaven, right? Or is it a pizza? Are you taking the pizza away? Or taking the piss? Feeling indoctrinated? Groovy? Backward and forward and backward across the grooves we stride, tramping the eternal pathway to a brighter, jollier land. Remember?

But this isn't a revolution of love at all, this is popular music. Like Pam Ayres or something. A popular music which sees things in clean, rounded wholes, which maintains the value of older, more comfortable thoughts, frightened of the inconsistencies of change.

A paranoid, right-wing orchestral voice to uplift and to uphold. Hip, hip!

Given the opportunity BJH mull over the fact that they've spent the last ten years of so mulling over the past, ten years or so ago. Ah, an age of age, a rage at rage, yea indeed a coming that just keeps starting and never stops.

It's staring you in the face. "XII" sounds more than slightly frightened, because (politics as aside as it ever is) BJH must have finally realised that words give 'selves' away. Y'know, man, relative degree of commitment and contemporaneity.

Barclay and Nothingness' harvest, 1978. "XII".

HAWKLODS
25 Years On (Charisma)
Old hippies rarely die, they just bland away.

There's every chance that this could be a very big album for the Hawkloids. It's cunningly commercial in an impressive way. The polite word for it is "eclectic". Somewhat more cynically, you might say they've taken on board a lot of successful formulae created by others.

On the opener, "Psi Power", there's the same blend of cosmic lyrics, cute harmonies, and taut guitar that characterised Spirit around the time of "Dr Sardonicus". With "Free Fall", you could be listening to some Pink Floyd film soundtrack from the late '60s.

Then again, "Twenty Five Years" is Roxy Music from their art-school glitter days. The obvious influences seem unending. Bob Calvert's vocals on "Flying Doctor" could be those of any intellectual new waver, and the backing track is slow XTC. But you get the gist.

It's extremely odd that after all these years this band still sound like bits of other people. A distinctive style has eluded them.

Still, it'll no doubt go down well with their original followers, many of whom are well on the way to being grandparents by now. There's nothing here to so much as ripple the surface of their g and t's.

BLACKWELL

Boogie Down

(Rampage Records)

Take your suit to the boogie, wherever yo' assertion leads. It's a clean livin' thing, can you dig it? Put yo' ass in, take yo' ass out, shoot it all about. This record will self-erase in seven tracks. Perhaps you can fiddle with something to the cover picture.

These ladies look like plastic fruit. Insect-limbed artificial flotsam and jetsam doing nothing more or less than simply being there.

Why do I want my mind disturbed? Do I hate my body? Am I ashamed of my feet? As an intellectual do I secretly desire that feet didn't exist, that the inclination to Boogie Down could be declared null and void, in short, that the world could simply evaporate into one's idea of it, where physical reverie of all kinds was out of the question?

Why have I got a headache? Has "Boogie Down and Mess Around" got anything to do with de-evolution? Has "Belly Button" got anything to do with death? Where is all this leading? To a greater understanding?

Where is all this leading? I just can't wobble my body in front of people. Can't I stay at home? Do it to a cushion?

RACING CARS

Bring On The Night

(Chrysalis)

This can be no-one's idea of a 'significant' album, but it is interesting in terms of the band's apparent motivations. The Racing Cars always did seem like they were going to abandon themselves out west — which is presumably why Jim Mason is at the controls to effect the total Americanisation of the band.

Having worked with The Cate Bros, Firefall et al, Mason has the kind of curriculum vitae which really tells its own story: Racing Cars are aiming this for the American market, and the product is so 'right' it's not true. At a time when even the Americans are learning to be embarrassed by the blandness of their Californian muzak, a British band is taking the genre to the limit. A few years too late, maybe, but bigger and better than many of the coastal bands.

"Travelling Mood" is representative of the 'heavier' material: nice, but essentially nothing more than a run-of-the-mill trucking song. Like the Faces without the balls, it has a neat beat, although Ray Ennis on guitar sounds a little unfulfilled.

Altogether an album of spectacular competence, though one of ultimately questionable merit.

Emma Ruth

CRAWLER

Snake, Rattle And Roll

(Epic)

Elevation! Strength! Restoration! The new Crawler album! Sweatshirt, pay dirt, kick ass, quick stash, cash, cash, cash . . .

Hot potato, he swears! Not just another leather jacket ejaculation. It all swaggered before his eyes as he felt rock and roll.

His consciousness rising, pulse racing, muscles contracted to a Wimpy, fingers clamping 'round imaginary snakeskin boots, albums climbing up the north face of the mythical "American Hot 100" . . . oh yes! His heart beat like a deposit account.

He lived the life of the songs of Crawler, through thick and thin, fat and lean, girls and, sometimes, ladies: Eden . . . Madison Square . . . Garden!

Rock and roll is all about, he thought, rock and roll!

IAN GOMM

Summer Holiday

(Albion Records)

Ian Gomm is ex-Brinsley Schwarz, previous home of half the Rumour, and of Nick Lowe in the days when he used to write good songs. Perhaps spurred by their newfound fame, Ian Gomm has come up with his own solo album, and one which evokes the spirit of the Brinsleys far more closely than does the subsequent work of his erstwhile partners.

Ian Gomm away from home

Paul Cox

"Summer Holiday" is gentle, unassuming, well-made pop. Tasteful, melodic, and ever so pleasant. The best songs are on side one — "Airplane", the catchy new single "Hold On", the gusty reggae of "Sad Affair", the slinky reggae of Chuck Berry's "Come On" which is mysteriously absent from the cover track list.

Side two has the slight, soulful "That's The Way I Rock'n'Roll" and an intriguing version of The Beatles' "You Can't Do That" which grows on me thanks to the upfront bass and a vaguely sinister keyboards part that's reminiscent of "You've Lost

That Loving Feeling". The rest of the side tends toward anonymity, except for the wimpy ballad "Another Year", which is cloyingly annoying.

It's an album I like very much, without being able to summon up a lot of enthusiasm — perhaps because Ian Gomm has been almost too modest in his aims and achievements. Next time I hope he'll produce something more substantial — and longer. "Summer Holiday" clocks in at barely 15 minutes per side, hardly a fair deal at today's prices. Especially since the motto of Albion Records is the holy "a cultural service to the community".

DUDLEY MOORE
The Music Of Dudley Moore
(Columbia)
RICHARD WRIGHT
Wet Dream (Harvest)
STEVE KUHN
Non-Fiction (ECM)

Three different ways to be moderate and derivative with the piano, and Dudley Moore's double compilation surprisingly emits more passion than either of Kuhn's or Wright's efforts. And you thought I included him for a laugh? — so did I.

Moore plays light, swinging, antiseptic MOR jazz piano with much flair and enthusiasm. Thinly entertaining, but it knows its place. He's a versatile composer, using straight lifts of broad styles such as Bach and Peterson or just simple stylistic tricks for specific evocation, this evident on the soundtracks he supplies for his own films (represented here by Bedazzled and 30 Is A Dangerous Age, Cynthia). Good competent stuff.

What am I saying? The Wright debacle demands to be taken seriously by virtue of the condescendingly cryptic sleeve (a Hippocampus travesty, and how accurate Lowry was when he judged all Hippocampus packaged albums to be rubbish), the music's solemnity and the Pink Floyd serious musician myth... A myth this dull and immature record should completely smash. Wright's placid keyboards, synthesiser and vocals do not in fact dominate the record. "Snowy White's" extrovert guitar parts and Mel Collins' soothing sax come close to doing that. Larry Steele (bass) and Reg Leadore (drums) also aid.

The ten tracks demand to be treated with 'respect'. But it's exceedingly difficult to be gentle and avoid tedium. Wright in fact fails miserably: throughout the record the colours are pale, the structures loose (messy not 'funky') and the moods diffident. Wright is too ambitious. "Wet Dream" resembles the type of transparent, innocent stuff Dvorak could knock up without misplacing a hair, but lacking in any full melodic wealth. It's not even good 'rock'.

It is noticeably Floydish music of deluding emphasis and touch. Hardly what Rolling Stone called "pregnant and poignant" but "muted and passive". It just doesn't have the depth of feeling to support its delicate demands. It's pleasant, but an album that shadows and caricatures atmosphere and experience. If you really want something precious, glowing, vaguely modal, exotic and precise, dig up some Debussy. Now there's a musician.

Dick Wright, Richard to you

Kuhn's record is familiar, charming post-Coltrane quartet stuff. Five pieces, just under 40 minutes of music and that legendary ECM sound quality. Kuhn's piano is cautious, Steve Slagle's sax and flute work slightly more robust, Harvie Swartz's bass a little too cocky, Bob Moses' drumming cheerfully functional.

It's a typical ECM record. Harmless and calm. Only rarely can an ECM album be wildly enjoyed rather than numbly appreciated. Save up for the Keith Jarrett 10 album set.

GORDON GILTRAP
Fear Of The Dark (Electric)
Ideal background music for BBC2 documentaries on hang-gliding.

All things percussive, synthesised, ethereal and choral, also of course Giltrap's guitars, combine to be pleasant but insubstantial.

It'll probably sell more than the last half-dozen John Fahey and Leo Kottke albums put together, although those gentlemen's taste and restraint only highlight Giltrap's speedy excesses.

Titles include "Roots (Parts One And Two)" and "Visitation". Draw your own conclusions.

CALDERA
Time And Chance (Capitol)

Fortunate sinners of old used to suffer a mere plague of locusts or some such pestilence of one sort or vermin or another. I fear that I must either give up rock criticism or I must confess, because the descent upon my dwelling place of but one more jazz-rock or jazz-pop samba swarm will surely be the eternal agony of me, not to mention open neck shirts worn outside the jacket.

Such of these swarms as are want to descend upon me are constituted of an unnatural ectoplasmic mass of grins, perms, pendants, orchestral strings, cosmic-lone-poem titles, and — the final solution — digital esononic modulators.

The dry, flittery beating of percussion instruments is a relentless gnaw. The poisonous, viscous keyboard ejaculations stick to your flesh and arouse the Rash of a Thousand Polyphonic Imitations. The fatal sting is one of Pan American acoustic guitars which, once inserted, induces a smiling, torpid, twittering coma: to withdraw from it is to risk transmutation into a canvas shoe at the very least.

It is the shapelessness of these swarm-attacks, though, more than ought else which drives the mortal victim to his fateful prolonged end — distraction, catatonia and cashmere sweaters even. The fusion-devil seem so ambivalent and laid back, as if hardly aware of their mission, hardly cognisant with the abyss of comfort their victims are pushed toward.

But I have been told, and this I learnt from an old man far from any state of dementia or vagrancy, told that the devil hide their malicious enjoyment of the suffering beneath the fabled moustaches which each and every one is rumoured to wear.

Imports

First, a quick newflash for Elvis Costello devotees. Your lad's "This Year's Model" album has surfaced on Swedish Smash with not only a different sleeve but — get ready to gasp — also an alternative version of "Watching The Detectives". Import shops are already stocking and anxious to take your moan.

Back on the main wave, there's a Reuter report concerning one Linda Keel. The name may be reasonably familiar to you, as Pye have already released her version of Nick Gilder's "Roxy Roller" here as a single. But for those of you who treasure longer engagements, I'll impart the info that also around right now is a Vogue album called "Lady Rock And Roll". A gutsy-voiced, innocent-eyed lady with a pushy little band, I imagine she'd light up Dingwalls real well for an evening or two. Pye should lavish a quid or two on a hovercraft ferry for her.

Matthew Moore's another who's had an introductory single pushed out in these isles. Titled "Savannah", it came out a couple of years ago, got raved over but somehow failed to follow up with Moore's album which, oddly enough, has now turned up on Caribou/CBS. "Winged Horses" features back-up contributions by the likes of Steve Cropper, Jim Price, Jim Keltner, Don Preston, Davey Johnstone, Russ Kunkel, Jim Gordon, Carmen Twilley and David Jackson, who was bassist with The Moon.

Vocally, Moore's got nothing to learn. "Horses" is the kind of late evening job that seems to improve with subsequent listening sessions.

I'll skip the coloured vinyl report this week on account of the fact that it's not only totally confusing but equally boring — though I guess I ought to warn Presleyites to ready their wallets for the forthcoming "Legendary Performer Vol. 3" (ACA), which will not only contain four previously unissued Elvis tracks but also be a picture disc. Meanwhile, those prize loonies at Rhino Records claim that their 12" E.P. by the Temple City Kazoo Orchestra is "pressed on disco vinyl, an exclusive product of Rhino". And the music matches the sleeve info, for the TCKO, no doubt overwhelmed by the critical acclaim afforded their previously issued version of "Whole Lotta Love", have massed their kazooes once more to provide fresh onslaughts on The Bee Gees' "Stayin' Alive", The Stones'

"Miss You" and good ol' Richard Strauss' well known space theme — which emerges here as "2001 Sprach Kazoosha".

It's all a nutty gag of which I approve, though I doubt it the TCKO will inspire a massed return to the roots [yeah, the music really does have roots as anyone who ever latched onto the Mount City Blue Blowers will tell you], or even an instruments page on kazooes from CSM.

HERE'S A LITTLE NUMBER THAT'S BEEN VERY LUCKY FOR US

the neat little 4/2 mixer.

You chose a guitar after reading our comparative bit on copies of the classic names in electric axes.

Then you plugged in and laid down that little number you dreamed up in the bath.

And the world of sound fell at your feet. Now you play backgammon with Prime Ministers' wives and cut albums with famous criminals.

Strange to think you owe it all to November's Sound International.

FIRST 15,000 IN SPECIAL COLOUR BAG AND ON BLUE VINYL

FROM THE FORTHCOMING ALBUM 'CRASH LANDING'

A sad fact, proved to be true night after night, is that without proper amplification, good guitarists with expensive instruments will sound bad. The worse the sound, the worse the playing and everyone suffers. It's a waste of good money and talent.

Since Yamaha make excellent musical instruments they naturally needed amplifiers of compatible quality to do them justice, and since only the best is good enough for Yamaha, they built their own.

Like the rest of their instruments, Yamaha amplification is a satisfying blend of sophistication and reliability, characteristics not shared by a lot of their rivals.

But then Yamaha is a breed of its own.

TOOLS OF THE TRADE

What should you pay for a P.A.?

ZENON DE FLEUR of The Bishops with some advice for bands just starting out.

SO YOU'VE got the band together, got the amps and guitars, heading for the stars: and dying to do your first gig. In days gone by the singer would've brought along a couple of columns and a mixer amp and you were set. But go to a gig these days and you see mounds of gear and have a fit on discovering the cost.

So you decide you need a P.A. anyway, but where do you start? What do you buy? And how much?

Well! First of all the alternative to buying is to hire and it will cost you from £30 per gig upwards, depending on how much you need. However this is worth serious thought because if your gear is not used a lot it will work out cheaper and more convenient to hire.

Bearing in mind that owning your own you have to transport it, store it, and have someone operate it, this all adds to the cost.

So you want to buy anyway and the first thing you must decide is, what kind of system is most suitable? And can you afford it?

If you play predominantly small venues a set-up of a pair of columns and 100 or 200 watt mixer amp, such as an H/M, will do, and you can hire for the bigger gigs. That should set you back well under £1,000, including

The drawback here is that expanding the system is not easy, but losing on the resale value is.

You can, of course, buy second hand but unless you know a bit about it or have good advice the pitfalls are too numerous. Best thing is to consult a reputable dealer specialising in P.A. The guy in the local music store, while being fine for strings and picks, probably knows little more about it than you.

Most professionals will be glad to give advice and it's free, so get all you can.

When spending a lot of money it makes good sense to buy the best quality

"name" equipment, for this will not only be more reliable but will also hold its value. Get a demonstration of the gear, make sure you know enough about it and that you're happy with it. Don't be fooled by cosmetics.

It's not possible in this brief article to go into the workings of P.A. systems. So to get a rough idea here is a 400 watt system with adequate monitoring onto which items can be added, as you get bigger, up to any size:

2 x JBL 4560 pattern bass bins

2 x JBL 2345/2420 radial horns c/w capacitive crossover

3 or 4 1 x 12" ATC wedge monitors
RSD 800 B power amplifier
RSD 12/2 mixing desk
RSD 12 way 50 metre multicore

Shure SM58, SM57 vocal and instrument microphones

AKD 12 microphone for bass drum

Various microphone stands and required cables

Flight cases for the mixer, amps and cables are a good idea to protect your investment.

The above are quality components of proven reliability and would put a three-and-a-half grand hole in your pocket. H.P. is available if you've the deposit but don't forget you'll have to insure it all. Cheaper systems are around but satisfy yourself with a demonstration first; ultimately you will always get what you pay for.

Having bought the P.A. you'll need someone to operate it and mix the sound. His job will be getting a balanced, clear sound without over-running the system and causing expensive damage to amps, speakers and horn drivers. So again, if in doubt, seek advice from professionals; or better still get someone to show you how best to set up and run the rig and do simple maintenance.

Anything major should be left to competent specialists.

So where do you go for advice? In London good places to start are: HMB P.A. Hire and Sales of Cricklewood or Mick Jones Music of Putney.

Tell them your requirements and budget and they'll put a system together to suit. They handle all the "name" quality equipment by such manufacturers as R.S.D., J.B.L., A.T.C. Shure, etc. . . .

A few words about connectors. Use only heavy duty types e.g. Cannon or Switchcraft. They are the lifelines of the P.A. and most prone to faults. Check them regularly to avoid embarrassing breakdowns.

To summarise then. Don't spend on flashy gear you don't need. Don't ask what'sname, and don't buy without trying first. Do go to a reputable dealer, get good opinions and advice and spend wisely on good quality equipment.

Is this enough for the Hope & Anchor...?

The Dooleys: The Sound of Success!

The Dooleys' outstanding professionalism has paid off in the many honours—among them "Club Group Act of the Year." They may make it look easy, but don't be misled. Hours of hard work and minute attention to detail go into every performance.

Case in point: their sound equipment. It's first class all the way—Shure SM58 professional microphones, and Shure SR componentry. It's their insurance that The Dooleys' fans will hear every nuance of sound—whatever the venue, from the most intimate clubs to the biggest halls.

Now that's a tough act to follow.

artistic integrity is all down to moving as many units as possible.

Absolutely and it's disgusting. Lawyers were never needed in the old days. The major record companies really upset me. And, one of the most upsetting things was Bruce Springsteen... that was the ultimate act of record hyping... it was so blatant. He writes good songs, but in my opinion he was no more than average.

I thought that, but having seen him recently he's made that giant step. His show was unbelievably good.

I still find his recordings disappointing... I disagree.

But he's got such a great band — same with Ian Dury. I also liked Wreckless Eric's first couple of singles. At one time I was going to produce a couple of things with Wreckless, but I felt a little out of touch... unsure which musicians to use. I almost used The Blockheads... a magnificent band and that's why Dury's records are of such high quality. The backing tracks alone would make a great album. Tom Robinson is another example of someone who made a great record. "2-4-6-8 Motorway", but failed to follow it up. I just wish he'd make another good record.

He did, the "Rising Free" EP.

I know he's politically motivated... I don't know the man. I think he's great, but I can't take most of the stuff on his album. But "Glad To Be Gay" was a fine record, which brings me right back to the big record companies. Tom Robinson's "2-4-6-8 Motorway" was an example of Capitol Records being inefficient and losing that record in America along with the Kate Bush single and even Steve Harley's "Come Up And See Me". They don't seem to be able to break British records in America to save their life.

To return to your career again. Apart from becoming typecast, do you feel that you ever got over-exposed to the point where you got sick of reading about the exploits of Elton John?

I probably did get over-exposed, but it never really bothered me up until 1975. Problem is, people judge me on my outward image.

I haven't done any interview like this for well over two years but there's some bullshit printed in the papers about me almost every day... about me going to Brazil, getting off a plane, realising there was a football match back home and catching the Concorde to Paris and then onto London — utter bullshit. Same about me spending £2,500 in a New York restaurant, also completely untrue.

But people believe all that crap.

Trouble is, you can't have a go back, because people like Jean Rook in the Daily Express, and Patricia Boxall, and Linda Lee-Potter have the last word.

I'd love to have a go at Jean Rook live on TV with her sitting across from me, because aside from its sports coverage the Daily Express really is the pits. It epitomises precisely what's wrong with this country. I hate those people and I'll always fight them because it's wrong that people like Jean Rook are given so much power to implant information in so many readers' minds.

Have you ever considered doing something like a Rock Against Racism gig?

No I haven't, but don't get me wrong. I believe in the same things they champion — equal rights, the abolition of censorship — but at this time in my life it would be dishonest of me to do such gigs because my heart and soul isn't in it. And that's not meant to be a convenient cop-out.

But even if you only made a non-performing appearance or jammed on a number?

I'd probably get bags of flour and beer cans thrown at me.

Why do you say that? You'd probably reach more people than The Clash and Tom Robinson because you're such a public figure?

I think I'm a bit afraid. Sure I'd be willing, but how would some of the New Wave bands react? I support all these new bands and I'd go along with my arms wide open, but they might not accept me.

If they believed you were honest in your convictions why should there be problems?

I often underestimate myself. Musicians have got this terrible thing, they never phone each other up because they assume everyone is far too busy. I love playing on other musicians' sessions, but hardly anyone invites me because they think it's a waste of time in the first place to ask. I'd love to play with some of the New Wavers, like Cook and Jones.

But to return to the subject of rock as a political weapon. Music can only do so much. If you want to fight racist organisations then you've got to do it on a more political level. This I've learned through my experiences with Watford and various councils. It's no use jumping up on stage and screaming, we hate this and that and that's the end of it. You have to get actively involved outside of music.

Probably, there are some bands who do this, but I suspect that some bands leap on the RAR bandwagon knowing that they'll get good press coverage from it. It's no use just making a record about it because it only lasts for as long as you're up there on stage performing. You've got to actively campaign. You can knock Joan Baez as much as you want to — I think she's boring, but she got up off her backside and actually got physically involved. Same with Jane Fonda. And you can't knock them because they did back up their beliefs and I admire them for that.

Let's be realistic, it's power that runs and changes any country and you can't change things overnight with a hit song. The idea of rock singers getting into politics is rather stupid because most of them can't even organise their own lives, what with getting ripped-off.

Having said all that, there's nothing wrong with being idealistic if you're sensible about it. But those people who scream and rant about unemployment and whatever in their songs... will they go out and vote at the next election? Probably not. Trouble is that the British have always been so apathetic about things.

The other problem is that there's also so many armchair socialists. I love Brian Clough as a person and he's a staunch Labour man, but he drives a Mercedes and is more money-orientated than anyone.

People will say, who am I to talk... yes, I'm in a difficult position... I live in this big house, own this and that. But I do keep a lot of people employed.

I genuinely believe I'm physically doing something worthwhile with Watford.

Furthermore, I'm trying to get a better deal for sport which, I've come to realise, is more important than music. So nowadays, my values and political motivations are with Watford Football Club. Because, if I created an indoor music centre and stocked it with thousands of pounds worth of gear, it would get ripped off. Because, underneath it all, that's what the music business is really all about.

BILLIE JO SPEARS headlines the "Nashville Cavalcade" package tour, which also features such C&W stalwarts as Lloyd Green, Vernon Oxford and Ronnie Prophet. Country music devotees can wallow in it at Ipswich (Saturday), Norwich (Sunday), Peterborough (Monday) and Belfast (Tuesday).

SANTANA are back in Britain for a short tour, kicking off with three days at Wembley Arena on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday — with concerts in Stafford and Manchester to follow. But there's a very heavy demand for tickets, so you'd better hurry along. Pictured above: Carlos Santana.

SUZI QUATRO is playing a short series of dates, before she leaves for America to film some more "Happy Days" episodes. This week she's at Peterborough (Saturday), Manchester (Sunday), Sheffield (Monday) and Oldham (Tuesday), with a London concert to follow in next week's Gig Guide.

GRAHAM PARKER & The Rumour are back in action as the opening attraction at London's latest rock centre, The Venue in Victoria. They appear there for three nights from next Wednesday (playing twice nightly) and, as a bonus, there are restaurant and bar facilities available.

ISAAC HAYES is at last paying his much-delayed visit to Britain, accompanied by his full U.S. stage revue, plus special guest Edwin Starr and his backing band — totalling over 50 performers in all, and that sounds good value for money. Their first gig is in Manchester on Tuesday.

WHITESNAKE are undertaking their first major concert tour, starting at Newcastle (Thursday), Edinburgh (Friday), Glasgow (Sunday) and Brighton (Wednesday). And with Jon Lord now a permanent member of the band along with David Coverdale (above), it's a mini Deep Purple reunion.

LABI SIFFRE

SHAM 69 are headlining a major autumn tour, tied in with the release this weekend of their new album "That's Life". Their shows, the first of which is in Edinburgh next Wednesday, are billed as "Guy Fawkes Memory", though we're not sure why. Pictured is Jimmy Fawkes.

AC/DC play Liverpool (Monday), Edinburgh (Tuesday) and Glasgow (Wednesday), as the first gigs in their autumn tour promoting their new LP "If You Want Blood You've Got It".

THE JAM are playing 20 major dates in November in their "Apocalypse Tour '78", opening in Liverpool next Wednesday. Supporting Paul Weller (above) and the band, who'll be promoting their new album "All Mod Cons", are U.S. outfit The Dickies and Patrick Fitzgerald.

PENETRATION also hit the road this week, setting out at Huddersfield (Friday), Liverpool (Saturday), London (Sunday), Birmingham (Tuesday) and Newport (Wednesday).

YES return to the British concert platform this weekend, appropriately times to coincide with the chart success of their album "Tormato". They're at London's Wembley Arena on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, with an extra matinee on the last day. Pictured: Steve Howe.

CLIFF RICHARD is last but not least of the 12 big names beginning tours during the period of this Gig Guide. He starts his nationwide jaunt in Southampton on Wednesday.

BLAST. Pic: PAUL SLATTERY

BOOMTOWN RAT Bob Geldof. Pic: CHRIS HORLER

Boomtown Rats Dundee

So what is it about these guys that has otherwise intelligent and perceptive people falling over themselves to lavish critical acclaim on their extremely average persons? I just don't see it.

Well, maybe I do see it — it's called Bob Geldof — but it's the uncritical acceptance of something that's not just shallow and juvenile but intentionally shallow and juvenile that I find slightly bewildering.

"Shamelessly plagiaristic", "calculatedly assassin", "accomplished manipulator", enthuses the NME Book Of Modern Music. That's what these guys have going for them? Talk about Irish...

OK, let's take the back-up boys first. Apart from the fact that they all look like schoolboys on the skive, their chief characteristic is that they are entirely characterless, odd clothing excepted. When the big G leaves the stage (only briefly of course) they suddenly stand exposed as being incredibly ordinary. Gerry Cott manages a couple of nice guitar breaks, but that's about the sum total of their postage stamp personality.

Not that it matters really — they're only there as extras for Bob Geldof's big scene.

As for Geldof himself, he's nothing more or less than the thinking man's John Orway. His act is unbelievably goofy. Like a marionette on speed, he's all silly jumps and windmilling arms. A sugar coated kiddies' version of Roger Chapman, it's a lot of fuss signifying absolutely nothing. I'm convinced it's only the novelty value of his being Irish that enables him to get away with it.

Coming on like the crazy big brother that everybody loves to love, it's no coincidence that so many of Geldof's fans are so young. He's the Santa Claus of rock'n'roll. All the tricks in the book from glitter ball to toy saxophone has the kiddies eating out of his hands. He's only got to look at his bare wrist and they all start to chant "Tick Tock". How long before Geldof takes over Crackerjack?

It's just as well Geldof's good natured rabble rousing occupies so much of the attention because underneath all the surface razzle dazzle there isn't really much to latch onto. Some easy to master choruses for the kindergarten crowd, and second rate, third hand r'n'b for the rest. The oldest songs and the singles are still their best songs, and only the slower numbers can muster any real power, though they definitely lack the impact of their vinyl counterparts.

So what will happen when all the hoo-hah dies away? There's very little of any originality here and precious little with any real depth to it. Just another showband after all.

All in all, it seemed entirely appropriate that this musical joke should be happening in the home town of the Beano. Strictly for the kids, young and old.

The Bishops

Nashville

The Bishops have always delivered, but I've never seen them play like this.

In a word, they were dynamite. From Zenon de Fleur's rhythm guitar and credible Link Wray impersonation to Dave Tice's vocals it was an exhilarating celebration of Rock'n'Roll, pure and absolute.

And don't mistake them for revivalists — that path leads to the Big Snore — the spirit on show here transcended fashion, defied classification and revitalised familiar songs. They convinced me they'd written "Route 66" the night before.

Blitz Krieg and Skid Marx from Blast Furnace contributed guitar and harmonica respectively, on one or two occasions, and must have walked away proud men. There was only one song that seemed out of place: "Someone's Gonna Get Their Head Kicked In Tonight".

They just don't need that kind of trash-trash. But by the time they'd reached "I Want Candy" I was ready to forgive them anything. Buy the single and have a party.

Johnny Guitar and Zenon de Fleur swooped and soared like fighter planes leaving trails of steel-ribbed smoke in the air, while Pat McMullen's bass and Paul Balbi's drums fuelled the rhythm engine with pure nitroglycerine.

This band play with such locomotive power that Superman would stand aside and let them pass. "Train Train", "I Need You", "Reeling 'n' A Rockin'", "Shake Your Money Maker" — but who really cares about individual titles?

How many bands have you seen recently getting five encores; every one a killer and every one deserved? No frames of reference. No comparisons. They stand alone.

If the thunder don't get you then The Bishops will.

Nell Norman

The Pirates

Leeds

The last time I saw the Pirates (Hull, late May), Mick Green was helped from the stage experiencing the full implications of free cosmetic surgery courtesy of an unidentified flying glass. He brought it on himself then, and to a certain extent, he always will.

The Pirates exploit every aggressive instinct in the book and — more so than their younger, less accomplished punk cousins — they will always threaten to pay the price for playing classic rock and roll so good it hurts.

This time the band took to the stage to a pre-recording of "Yo Ho Ho (And A Bottle Of Rum)" (traditional), and quickly belted into the Johnny Kidd tune "Please Don't Touch" and "I Can Tell".

It looked to be a retake of the Nashville Rooms side of "Out Of Their Skulls", only they halted the sequence with a funky rendition of the Ray Sharp chestnut, "Linda Lou", this number epitomising The Pirates' formula of building rhythm suspense to interrupt themselves with a sudden and brutal unloading of every trick in their R&B brief.

Johnny Spence then began his listmotive for the evening, which was loosely based around the concept of "sweating". We couldn't be having a good time unless we sweated: the sweatiest it got, the more likelihood there was of us having a good time.

"We'll get you sweaty," promised Spence — and that's exactly what happened. Everybody sweated and had a good time together.

It had as much to do with the central heating as with the Pirates, but everyone was sweating so much, nobody was in any condition to realise it.

"Don't Munchen It" and "Gibson Martin Fender" followed. Apart from "Linda Lou", The Pirates hadn't yet ventured away from their first album. Were they trying to tell us something? And was the PA really that bad, or was it just Spence's mouth wrapped too far round the mike-head?

But then came "Four To The Bar" the "Skull Wars" number written when Green and Spence were "well pleased in a London pub". Green celebrated the number with soaring, slashing lead and broiling rhythms.

By this time though, the absolute supremacy of a band so obviously on top of the case got to be a little monotonous. Incredible but true. After a while, it becomes self-evident that every member is essentially the same, and that it's all too easy, second nature production line stuff for old virtuosos pushing 40.

The Pirates aren't challenging themselves any more, because they can't — they founded the frontier, and now there's no place to boldly go.

The Pirates shared the loot evenly and Spence got his pound of sweat. Their music is glorious, but essentially it's music to get canned to. From a critical point of view, there are no nadirs and no zeniths. What the Pirates have achieved is the modernisation of a number they knew a long, long time ago. What they do, they do better than anyone, but sometimes even even-keeled excellence can get boring.

"Johnny B. Goode", a suitably raucous first finale was followed by the ultimate "Lonesome Train", by which time there was a surfeit of sweat, onstage and off (which meant that everybody had had a good time).

It was all adequate proof that the Pirates are a treasure of exhilarating, stylised music, but they're marooned in a different time wrap. That's not a bad thing, but the message I got here was that they're the last band to be studied by the same reviewer more than once.

Blast Furnace And Dingwalls

Less hear it one talm, people, because as sho' as bears shit in the woods an' this ole world keeps turnin', somewhere somehow someone's a-gonna be laying' a mess of blues and someone's gonna be a-pickin' 'em up.

Blast Furnace racked up a royal flush down Dingwalls last night. Oh yeah, natch some wiseass is gonna creep out the wainscot to point out that my heart is just an appreciat waiting to be upset — aint there always one? — but I'd like to go into Granby Condensed rite here and now and say Blast Furnace is one halluva mutha, collectively speaking, people.

Kicking off for the new Sunday night R&B sessions, Blast are gonna be tuff to top for sheer galling-gun gameness. "South Of The River" came thumping off the stand like a jackhammer handler in a hailstorm on the lip of Vesuvius.

They tore through their numbers — "I Hear Ya Knocking", "Keep On Dancing", "Can't Stop The Boy", "Mustang Sally", "Nutbush City Limits" — 'n' encoored with an embolism-dissolving "Rip It Up".

The leader, suss sleek svelte snake-hipped space-bared wet-sweating and yet somehow oh-so in his cool, sported the sunglasses bequeathed to him by his blind Mississippi mentor, the legendary and spectacular Big Dolland 'n' Aitchison, and worked his proverbial butt off.

Value! Skid Marks blew yowling harp like a cat dogged by a harpound on his trail, while the egregious Blitz Krieg slid slide guitar like Hutto's Hawks in a hailstorm with a jackhammer handler on the lip of Vesuvius.

If ya wanna hear a good honest British blues band that plumb dee-livers, Mrs. Glove's little boy is tipping Blast and the boys for win, show and place.

Merger Doll By Doll Pressure Shocks

The Roundhouse

A pleasant evening at London's Roundhouse. Not many people, so lotsa room for dancing. Ageing hippies, a scattering of punks, but only the occasional roots person in evidence.

Pressure Shocks are on first, a reggae group I haven't heard before. They're very good. They hit a nice, danceable yet relaxed groove with "I Lay Me Down" and keep it just so throughout the set. The songs are hard-hitting, political — "Blood Money", "Policemen", "CIA", "Fight For Your Rights". The last, a stirring, up-tempo number, was messed up by an ill-judged attempt to elicit audience participation.

Good, tough rhythms, sensuous harmonies, lovely delicate lead guitar. Definitely a group to see again.

I've already raved about Doll By Doll in these pages so I'll just say they're still an exciting and imposing band. Their slower, soulful material came across well but a little of their ferocious intensity was lost in the draughty spaces.

The extra volume used to fill a large venue meant their precision and hard-edged distinctiveness became blurred. At times they sounded like a good, poppy Heavy Metal group, but really they're better than that.

Merger — now, as at Blackbushe, a six-piece — rounded off the evening with a set of pacy, sophisticated reggae that was far livelier than the music on the "Exiles In Babylon" album. "African Lady" and "Ghetto Child" from the album began the set, and another "Exiles" track, "Understanding" — treated here with a marvellous dub interlude — provided a brilliant encore.

In between, they were entertaining in patches. Highlights were the slow, almost mellow "Take It Easy" and the powerful protest of "Soweto" — spoiled slightly by one of those long-winded "meet the band" interruptions.

The rest was divided into clichéd love songs and clichéd Rasta songs. "Babylon Is Falling Down" and "Armageddon Time" were the usual doomy prophecies, while "Evergreen Land" was one of those "there is a happy land somewhere else" variations which display wishful thinking at its most banal level.

As for the music — I preferred Pressure Shocks' easy-going tunefulness to the faster, choppy complexities of Merger but I guess that's just a peculiarity of my taste. And certainly, in Tony Osei, they have a keyboard player of exceptional talent and inventiveness.

But, enjoyable as they were, Merger don't have any really special songs. The dubbed "Understanding" came closest, but they'll need many more songs of that calibre before they can really justify a top-billing, and draw in the crowds.

Graham Lock

Barry Ford

Nashville

Too much of all that passes for modern music is merely an unashamed rehashing of well worn ideas and form. How refreshing it is to find an artist who is willing to break a few boundaries and come up with music a little different.

Mat Stagger has done this with his new band. There is something arresting about a guy who, while looking like a true Rasta, writes plain honest to goodness rock 'n' roll songs. His eclectic influences are startling. From the roots-rockin' "Crowded Road" to the lilting soulful melody of "Sunshine", a finer cross-section of black music's finest moments over the last decade or so would be hard to recall.

Mat Stagger (the band) will be causing a lot of critical interest in the not too distant future, and if the rock 'n' roll finale "When The Girls Come Out, The Boys Come Out Too" is the standard maintained it'll be fun.

Barry Ford has been keeping a somewhat low profile since he parted company with Merger. However he has a new band and is starting to gig in venues which will draw more interest. Merger continue to be in the forefront of the British Reggae scene, but on the evidence of Ford's set he could join them.

It is a failing of many British reggae bands that the influence of soul music dilutes the music till it sounds like bad Philly mush. If you can't find a new form as Mat Stagger have done, it is vital to have a true feel for soul music. And Barry is a real fine soul singer.

He sounded like Marvin Gaye on the sailing ballad "How Long". The backbone of the music was the rhythm section, with Ivor Steadman's bass keeping each song striding along aided by Leroy Holmes' economical but vital drumming.

HOW TO KEEP TRACK OF A ONE TRACK MIND

If you know someone whose thoughts keep returning to the same subject the 1979 Sex Maniacs Diary could be just what you've been looking for.

It's the perfect gift for someone who likes to keep track of all their naughty activities. And it's full of ingenious and entertaining ways to keep that person's mind firmly on one track.

There's a special sex position for every day of the year, as well as a kink of the week for those who fancy an occasional fling. And there is also invaluable information about the world's sexiest clubs, sex and your stars, and erotic games which anyone can play with anyone.

This illustrated pocketful of pleasure is beautifully bound and slim enough to keep handy at all times. For reference, for inspiration, and for fun.

Against this classy dancing rhythm Ford played licks that were by turn, sweet and angry.

"Oh What A Shame", a beautiful love song, was a showcase for his guitar with a dynamic percussive backing.

Ford also writes pointed songs of social comment. "Curfew" and "Freedom Fighters" may put over widely held ideas but they are sung with an honest conviction. "We're gonna whip them", for sure.

It was the set's last number, "Rebel, Rebel", dedicated to Johnny Rotten and Sidney Vicious that really had the soul and anger of great music. Various Merger people and Mat Stagger joined the band for the encore, "Understanding" — a fitting end to a fine night's music.

Michael J Pritchard

Tribesman

100 Club

The London Reggae Mafia is ranged about the inner perimeter of the near bar discussing its respective peccadilloes. Onstage, eight pieces of Tribesman are strutting their stuff to the delight of a few dozen dutiful dancers.

I circumspectly approach one reporter on a rival music weekly and ask his opinion of the band.

"Consistently entertaining," he says, aiming for an epigram. "One of the better bands on the circuit, but I'd rather be at home listening to Derrick Harriott."

An NME colleague is less enthusiastic. "They sound to me like an island reggae group." I am told with a sneer. "They'll probably sign them up as the next Steel Pulse."

Onstage, as if in answer, Tribesman are playing their "Back To Nature" number. "Does island exist?" asks songstress Maria Folkes. "Does it really persist — in madness?"

Personally I would rate Tribesman as inferior only to Misty among the second wave UK reggae bands to have emerged in 1978. They maintain a fluid and percussive sound, with vocal harmonies complemented by tight but relaxed instrumentation; short, neat songs, somewhat dull in the lyric department; and a good if unspectacular stage act.

Line-up of the group is: Maria Folkes and Robbie (vocals), Waggo T — brother of Blackstones' Byron Otis (drums), Rueben (percussion), Matthew Webb (lead guitar), Astro (bass), and Skool on congoes.

The 100 Club set is virtually the same as the one played by the group at Dingwalls the previous night.

Beginning with "The Vision", the group then move into their best tune "Wonder Wolf" — "It's time for I and I to get rid of you" — followed by "When I Father Come", "I Want To Know" and Ms Folkes' self-congratulatory "African Woman", also a strong tune.

The latter half of their act reviews "Your Smile", "Back To Nature", the single "Astro Dub", "Chant Of Wisdom", "Follow The Road" and, by way of encore, "Rockin' Time".

Tribesman are hereby recommended to anyone who likes reggae, anyone who likes dancing, in fact, anyone bar spoilt reggae journalists.

Leeds

A modest muster gave The Smirks (Against Travolta) a big production ovation at Leeds Poly. So much so, in fact, that the people who weren't there could use good alibis (and with Grease's second night down-town, they probably thought they had one). The absence of Alberto

C.P. Lee (his head having been 'cut open' the previous night) might have had something to do with The Smirks' ostensibly suspect draw-power, but in any event, this was a classy performance of the kind that deserved more witnesses.

Superbly controlled frivolity, characterised by choreographed anarchy, translucent computerised disco funk and R&B minimalism are what The Smirks are all about: regimented by premier Smirkers Neil Fitzpatrick and Simon Milner (ask a silly question . . .) this is very definitely (retailers) a band to be filed in the section labelled non-classifiable. 'Progressive pop' would probably suffice, but you have to work hard for even that.

The Smirks call their music 'the most fun you can have with your shoes on' and they're probably right. "OK UK", their latest/last single (unforgivably 'a miss') is the supreme rock and roll spoof, while "Up Eh Up" and "Island Sea", both showcases for Mike Doherty's flawless reggae drumming, are a couple of numbers which lend support to the 'non-classifiability' theory. "I Saw Her Standing There" which they throw in — but don't throw away — is neither here nor there, a harmless jeu of a tribute / rip off, but better Smirk songs are here, there and everywhere. "Rosemary" (the forthcoming single) is one of them, a number which should / oughta get this band launched once and for all.

The band worked hard to create the maximum feasible rapport: prankster / ex-busker Milner has total sass. And an Elvis (Presley) spoof was rendered with such panache — in body and in soul — that one felt Milner could bring home the New Faces bacon any time he likes.

With one or two exceptions, The Smirks' songs are as impressive as their goofing. They have intelligence and ingenuity, and though sometimes you wonder whether all the talent is being used in the optimum way, they're too intuitively ongoing to be contenders for the new wave failure lists. (They would have come over as good as they were if they'd received a vote as good as the one they gave).

So where did Travolta come into all this? Well, they encoored with "Night Fever" and a Travolta dance routine, set off by Milner's technical cartwheeling. "Barbers Ann" — almost as good as the Keith Moon rendition — wrapped it all up.

Definitely a band to be reckoned with. The Smirks will break the way they did when they get a hit single. If I was Eugene Mandi, I'd rifle some of the Rubinoos' funds and score some heavy duty promotion for "Rosemary". Because if that song isn't given an extra-special Berserkley nudge, The Smirks could end up doing vaudeville on sea cruises.

The Crack
The Softies
The Members
The Doomed

Royal College of Art

After such an event the need for a polemic against pessimism is large. However . . . a function is a function . . . rock'n'roll is rock'n'roll!

The Crack, an elderly, shifty three-piece, used the short (hard) fast rock song form as their mode of communication. They played the Kevin Coyne ironically sentimental classic "Poor Swine", totally avoiding the lean, aware angle of the song, brutally utilizing the streamlined dynamics used as a device by Coyne for the force of their version.

This laziness and bluntness typified their whole set. Channelled, shorn hard rock, with no fascination or appreciation. They lumbered through the longest set I've ever heard from such a lowly placed and crude support act. Narcissism or courage? In-sensitivity.

The Softies, back from a stay in Holland, are ugly, flabby and proud of it. Their rock music is a clumsy combination of Clash drive and Rush pontification, as welcome and as wondrous as a wart.

The underwhelming set commenced with the touching challenge "Why don't we try to save the seals, why don't we try to save the whales." By the time they reached "Johnny B. Goode" I was tempted to leap on stage and recite a poem. The one entitled "Chuck Berry may be a poet but . . ."

For The Crack and The Softies, I tapped my feet between songs.

The thin line between Benoit Brecht, Bruce Forsythe and the Boomtown Rats . . .

The Members are inevitably a next year's thing, a fact emphasised by the presence and response of Radar boss Andrew Lauder. This man knows his next year's things when he sees them.

The fresh-faced five-piece are dashing, undemanding lightweight entertainers. Their neo-anthem, story telling songs have cocky and caustic wit, are a crafty, confident blend of one dimensional mere-power and sketchy 'reggae' rhythms and are performed purposefully with wide-eyed but controlled on stage presence.

The lead singer is of the Geldof / Pursey extrovert line, all bug eyes, flailing arms, rubber body and exaggerated gestures. The Members are undoubtedly prospective teenage property. Be prepared for the TOPT appearance before next summer. And remember, when punk becomes pop, Peter Powell drools.

The paranoid delusions of our fifteen minute stars . . .

Dave Vanian, Rat Scabies and Captain Sensible have feverishly locked into each other again, shocked at the cruelty of the Real world, spurning the serious Brian James and seducing a poor mock-aristocratic bass player to complete their line-up.

Sensible now plays guitar. They didn't arrive on stage until 20 past one, with everyone tired and bored, but they still caused a considerable stir and raised a mighty cheer. The Damned could have been one of the greats. This time round they're a freshshow.

They dived through a shambolic, desperate, spasmodically mildly amusing 'set', the comedy uncontrolled and either contrived or unintentional.

The funniest thing for me was the fear in Rat Scabies' eyes when he stood stage front near hysterically imploring the mob (who he blenky abused again and again "what a bunch of tossers") to hit him on the head with beer cans, and his childish rage when the response got a little too healthy.

Sensible, Vanian and Scabies continually taunted the audience to spit or throw cans until things turned against them, and the sight of three huge bouncers ever ready to smash punters at the front who responded naturally to the teasing was not pretty.

Serious violence was a small step from the immature playing.

The music was a giggle. The Damned pace and stun still exists, disembodied and gaudy. Noisy and messy pop is a sweet young thing.

The Sweet are The Doomed immature ancestors in this line, though not as aggressively spiteful and certainly more middle class, and The Doomed charmingly murdered "Ballroom Blitz".

During "Jet Boy, Jet Plane", where all plastic was melted, the quartet were augmented by ex-Slaughter And The Dogs guitarist - hero - in - his - own - mind Mike Rossi, who churned out a non-stop line of macho guitar flesh fresh from jamming with The Crones at the Marquee the week before.

Everything becomes clear... we're all has beens, we're all failures, we're all crude, we're all retarded, we're all repulsive, we're all tough, we're all scared, we're all egotistical.

We're all doomed, which is a far better observation than 'we're all damned.'

Indeed, The Doomed could be the greatest existentialist-comedians since The Beatles but, despite the facade, they take themselves and their audiences too seriously.

And, worst of all, their crass antics, superficial desire for violence, and petty hatred for everyone and everything means that they're not even mildly entertaining. But probably, on their own terms, entirely successful. Naughty, nasty and nihilistic. The poor sods.

Woof Woof

The Fabulous Poodles

Music Machine

The lights dim, the strains of "South Pacific" wash across the dance floor, and a character in grubby overcoat and cartoon dog mask steps into the spotlight for a display of ham-fisted conjuring tricks.

Rest-assured that pastiche is still rife, lampooning at large, and those notorious wags the Poodles have once more been unleashed in the name of Bad Taste at London's Music Machine.

Their mainman, Tony de Meur, with his gangly, knock-kneed stance, seedy grin and polyester leisure suit, exudes such an aura of rank degeneracy that if he moved in next door you'd immediately qualify for a rent rebate.

As always, he's lent the generous support of his fiddle player, Bobby Valentino, who has all the lecherous charm of a strip club wine waiter, and bassist Richie C. Robertson, bending his quarried features and abbreviated legs to the art of blundering choreography.

Much as their set has improved with age, there's still a great divide between old and new material. The new one, especially "Oh Cheryl" and "Convent Girls", seem to be little more than revival rock 'n' rollers with spivvy 20's violin overtones — very accessible, but without much impact. The old ones such as "Mr Mike" and "Bike Blood", apart from being familiar anyway, have been around long enough to have a whole well-rehearsed stage act and character of their own.

Inspired by a meeting with the man himself that very afternoon, de Meur slipped in a tribute to Frankie Vaughan in the "Feb Posa Request Spot", that reached a level of crooning smarminess equaled only by Valentino's lovable rendition of "On The Street Where You Live" — punk backing, gobbling, the whole works.

They managed to look completely haywire while playing very tight, Valentino being the only outstanding musician, but the rest of them gooning around more than enough to compensate with well-oiled axe-swinging routines.

I've always thought of the Poodles as being restricted by having only a four-piece line-up — maybe a sax or keyboards would give them more scope. But when they're not just hamming it up, they can sidestep into old Chuck Berry and Wilson Pickett covers and play supreme full-bodied rock 'n' roll.

It works as it is, and it works a treat, evidence that those who can ease with the captivating ease of Tony de Meur are a rare commodity indeed.

Van Halen Bram Tchaikovsky

Rainbow

He might have lost The Motors but Bram Tchaikovsky certainly hasn't lost their motivation towards exclusive commercial appeal. His new outfit merely tries the same scam in a different guise.

By re-vamping listless melodies with a hardcore rock backing, they aim to be as accessible on stage as on radio, but this ill-matched support slot only emphasised that their intentions are way off the mark.

Off balanced by the over-exuberant drumming of Keith Boyce, the arrangements are all clipped down to a minimal three-piece sound that only works on straight rockers like "Sally Takes Little White Pills".

The rest of the set was so obviously derivative of early Beele harmonies and laboured pop formats, with uncomfortably fast thrashing chord patterns, that it failed to stamp any real character of its own. Maybe if they didn't favour such hazy echo effects on the vocals, prime offenders being "Sara Smiles" and "The Girl Of My Dreams", it wouldn't tend to erase any more memorable qualities.

As it is they're just background music — you can take it or leave it. On second thoughts, leave it.

Out of the frying-pan, into the mire; next up were America's new-found marriage of glamrock posing and thepaton H.M., Van Halen, a band who claim their main ambition is to "Kick ass, get laid and have fun", which suggests that I'm not alone in thinking that the quality of their music isn't of paramount importance.

Direct from the mould of Rush and Aerosmith, they're led by vocalist David Roth, with a mane of lanky locks matching his bear-rug chest. He steered them through a set of archetypal heads-down-mindless boogie with flash, arrogant posturing and ear-splitting volume to spare.

It's just as easy to answer such displays of appalling rock cliché with equally hackneyed criticism, but even judging them on the level of an H.M. stage act, they still didn't have much to offer.

Firstly, they sacrifice everything — melodies, instrumentals, any trace of subtlety, control or balance — to a compromise with every redundant rock gambit they could possibly resurrect. Lead solos were uncountable, as were bass solos (but worse), and the strobe-lit drum solos turned into co-operative workouts with the whole band grabbing sticks and practically mugging the drummer in an attempt to overstep the limits of brainless barrage.

And secondly, how the hell do they expect to build up any momentum when Roth spends more time railing the crowd about getting "way down at The Rainbow", and how "we're all gonna go crazy-tonight", than he spends yowling through his rustling larynx.

If they adopted a

VAN HALEN's David Roth: Pic: GEORGE BODNAR

Ramones-type, non-stop powerdrive approach, I don't doubt they'd be a lot more successful.

Who knows? ... (who cares?)

The Invaders

Hope And Anchor

Sweeping down from deepest Yorkshire, The Invaders take over this Islington celler in a fresh attempt to conquer the metropolis with a mixture of hard, melodic pop and light-metal boogie.

Their strengths include a rhythm section that booms along nicely and a lead guitar that's never less than crisp, and nifty. Plus a clutch of self-written tunes which suggest a closer acquaintance could bring its rewards.

And so to the big But ... Right now The Invaders are a whole that's unequal to the sum of its parts.

They take it away with "Juvenile", the bopalong tale of a teenage psycho and typical of the set in that it's a thoughtful piece and displays the boys' preoccupation with the problems of this "modern world" and the effects it's thought to have upon the soft machines (that's us) who toddle about between the tower-blocks.

Thus there follows a casebook-full of numbers all about brains and technology an' stuff. In fact the singer used to be in computers, or so he tells us, and "Computer Executioner" deals with — well, I guess the message is in the title as they say on Two-Way Family Favourites.

Despite these fashionable (although no doubt sincere) concerns The Invaders really aren't New Wave in any useful sense; shorter songs, to be sure, and shorter hair as well, but otherwise they're strictly inside the mainstream — commercial British rock as it has rolled for a decade or more. They're overwhelmingly so-so.

They've one potentially great song in "Milky Way", tougher and more abrasive than the rest, with an epic feel to it. I'm certain that with a dose more passion it could be something special.

And there's "Keep Your Music Live", and I'll drink to that, but it's all tied in with the irritating anti-disco-ism of "Disco Pneumonia", when The Invaders get that infectious then maybe they'll help tempt the punters out of the fun-factories, but not before.

Just one last quibble: why should Yorkshire lads try to sing like London boys, all post-Bolan vowels and Finsbury Park whine? It's taken us long enough to stop wanting to sound American without all this.

The Invaders should loosen up, abolish their inhibitions and try a few fresh directions, crank up the charisma and come across as if they mean it. They could do it. Failing that I'll venture there'll be better bands for which to part with your green and crinklies.

Leo Sayer

Palladium

A night distinguished for me by the worst support set I've ever heard and the most tuchus-licking tolerant audience ever assembled in one Vaudeville room.

The support, Xanadu I believe, were pure Take 6 done up as Lord John and crawled through various note-perfect, easy-listening keyboard schmelzies.

They told us that, "Y'know really a lot of great songs were written in the 60s (gentle applause) "and this is one of the best ... 'Maybe I'm Amazed,' yeah ..."

The audience lay back and were stroked all over in the worst way. The limp set crawled on and really it's pose there was only one thing wrong — the seats were facing the stage.

In the bar was a fair cross section of Leo's lovers. Late 20s early 30s middle class to a swizzle stick, poned up and puffed out.

The last time I'd seen Sayer he was dressed as a clown and supporting Roxy Music at the Rainbow, and I possessed his "Silverbird" album because it was 1974 and rock'n'roll was all over rotten.

A disembodied voice told us to welcome him and on bounced the "pop superstar" in, are you ready, a white suit, and the dinner party began.

His band — all in dungarees, with the bass player a ringer for Jim Croce — launched into "Endless Flight". (Well not so much launched as paddled around in).

Leo himself came over like a bouncy, happy, jolly chap who is in the entertainment business and is doing very well: "C'mon clap your hands! Sing Up! I can't hear ya!"

From the opener and into "One Man Band" which had grannie (and there were a few) singing along while Leo ran around miming and throwing personalized "ad libs".

Next up "Moonlighting", which I always thought was a great record. It jogged along fine (though the band were becoming irritating with their in-jokes and pseudo interest in their jobs) until Sayer lapsed into a Woolworths street girl accent that had the semi-detached smoothies rolling.

Listen Leo, my girlfriend worked in British Home Stores and I take offence at your 'daft tart at the disco' images. So take that smirk and shove it. Later we caught a glimpse of what a down-home lad the man is when he produced a flask of tea and walked amongst the front row encouraging them to sip and assure the balcony that, "Mmm lovely ... yes, that's tea alright!"

OK so I was the white man in the London Palladium. As for Leo, he's interchangeable with Essex or O'Sullivan or Byraves. He's making himself a few bob flogging mild manners and spineless rock'n'roll and everybody goes home happy.

He sang, "Baby, I don't know why I chose this lonely life but it seems it's strangling me now ..."

Every one a winner.

Wishbone Ash

Glasgow

It comes as a shock to realise that Wishbone Ash have been going for over eight years — they seem to represent some kind of rock'n'roll silent majority which rarely imposes itself on us pseudo-intellectuals hooked on the vagaries of fashion.

Anyway, it, as John Walters suggests, rock'n'roll is a sport rather than an art form, where youth and vigour have more importance than professionalism and expertise, then it's about time W. Ash went on a course of anabolic steroids.

The Wishbone Ash dual guitar sound used to be quite a big deal: all kinds of textural atmosphere possibilities, quite good at the time but since improved upon by Television and Simple Minds.

There's certainly plenty time to muse upon the reasons for their initial success, since they spend over two hours (no support act) playing virtually all of their first three albums, now six years old at least, together with a couple of later favourites and a couple of songs to promote the new album.

Quite interesting to hear it all again, even though I only really enjoyed a particularly fine "Phoenix" and "You See Red" (new single) which was okay.

Steve Upton still wanders forward for his solitary introduction. The garish kneecaps are gone, but he tells us what F.U.B.B. means and usually mentions football too, so we all think he's a regular guy: the one attempt at personality in the most faceless band since The Moles (the 60s Residents).

F.U.B.B. itself is the lowspot of the evening, including everything that should've been ditched Wishbone had made any attempt streamline their act.

Turner and Upton churn out a monotonous riff for about three months, and inspired by this Andy Powell and Laurie Wisefield take shots each at wrenching a few tired licks from their tortured souls.

I wonder if they still think they're being "progressive" (Remember progressive?)

The audience loved it. Every moment. Each head-shaking, fantasy-guitar-playing, stultifying second of two hours plus.

If you know Kurt Vonnegut's Canary In The Coalmine theory, Wishbone Ash's audience never heard the warning: they've been passed for years.

As far as I'm concerned Wishbone Ash's sole function is in having enough fans to keep the Apollo open. For that they can come back anytime.

Cheap Flights

Brecknock

Eight months I've been in London, and I've seen some duff gigs — but I've never encountered a band so relentlessly mediocre as Cheap Flights.

Apart from a token and very stiff reggae number they play a mixture of messy rock and ineffectual HM. But their rhythm has no power, their tunes no shape, their vocals no presence and their guitar work no excitement, no imagination, no originality. I kept waiting for a redeeming feature, for a good song to rise out of the goop, but I might just as well have been watching Top Of The Pops.

JAZZ DIARY

The London Musicians Collective are featuring Dave Roberts, Roger Smith, Nigel Coombes and Paul Rutherford on October 28th and Clive Bell, Richard Coldman, Colin Wood and Sylvia Hallatt on 29th.

The Pizz Express, Dean Street, London has Benny Waters with the Fred Hunt Trio on October 27th, the Collin Purbrook Quartet on 28th, and solo piano from Brian Lemon on 29th.

JCS gigs include the Morrissey-Mullen Band at the Half Moon, Putney on 29th, the Elton Dean Quartet and the Marc Chergl Quartet at 100 Club on 30th, the Don Weller-Terry Smith Quintet at the Red Deer, Croydon, on 31st and the Martin Blackwell Quartet at The Phoenix on November 1st.

The Band On The Wall, Manchester, presents Naima on October 26th and the Ronnie Scott Quintet on November 2nd. The Arbourthorne Hotel, Sheffield, has Wild Bill Davison on 1st.

Always good to hear of a new jazz club, this time the Oxford Jazz Centre, which promises to provide modern jazz every Sunday evening at The Old Fire Station Arts Centre, George Street, Oxford. There's also a new promotional body, The Northern Improvisation Circuit Association, dedicated to spontaneously improvised music, who are presenting tours by SME, Steve Beresford and Tristan Honsinger, the Johnny Rondo Trio, the Leeds Musicians Collective, the Birmingham Improvisation Group and the Feminist Improvisers Group.

Still time to catch the tail-end of the Newcastle Jazz Festival, with the Jazz Band Ball on October 26th, Stan Tracey and John Surman on 27th, Evans AR Weather Orchestra on 28th and the Mike Gibbs Big Band on 29th. Unfortunately, with the departure of the organiser, Andy Hudson, future festivals are uncertain.

The Vinyl label has released "Wiegand" by the Klaus Lenz Band, "Ah!" by the John Stevens Dance Orchestra, and "Deep" by Amalgam. Pablo's latest include "Jaimante" by the Monty Alexander Septet, "How Long Has This Been Going On?" by Sarah Vaughan, Oscar Peterson, Joe Pass, Louis Bellson and Ray Brown, two volumes of "Milt Jackson And Count Basie And The Big Band" and volume ten of "The Tatum Solo Masterpieces".

Obtainable from Collet's Record Shop, "Fruits" by the Phillip Wilson Trio with Leo Smith and Johnny Dyani, and "The Human Arts Ensemble Live" featuring Bobo Shaw, Luther Thomas and John Linberg, both on Circle Records, and from India Navigation, Chico Freeman's "Kings Of Mali" and Munoz's "Rendezvous With Now". Impulse have released John Coltrane's "Jupiter Variation".

RONALD ARSE and
 REG SHITT representing
 F.F.S. (FREEDOM for SH IT.)

Last Thursday I witnessed the "new saviour" of punk (aka Jimmy Pursey) shouting his mouth off on the Omnibus programme about the "pop" industry. Quote: "Punk was dead until Sham 69 came along, we revived punk."

OK Jim, you're a punk band are you? How come punks can't go and see you without getting their heads kicked in by your moronic "fans"? If you made it more clear to them that you were a punk band maybe it'd stop. What's up? You afraid that nobody would buy your records? Why don't you admit you're a skinhead band and stop trying to copy real punk bands e.g. Clash. You don't know fuck all about kids today.

"Angels with dirty faces. Kids from nowhere places. Kids like you and me."

I'm as much like you as Joe Strummer is like Des O'Connor! Do you know I can't even afford to go up to the pub! (Hurry Up Harry). Apart from the fact that I'm under age and I ain't the only one round here! What do you know about living in a boring town like this, with fuck all to do except smash things up? Wanna swap places for a few days Jim? You come and live on my estate and I'll go and live in your flat in "trendy" London, "where it all happens!"

Why don't you copy the example of your drummer and get your hair shorn. Then you could stop posing and pretending to be something you're not.

Female with silly name (15), Chichester, Sussex. P.S. Julie Burchill and Charles Shaar Murray are the only ones who know where it's all now.

As soon as Julie and I manage to agree on anything other than the new Loose Windscreen album we'll letcha know where "it" is "at". In the meantime, the punkitude of the poor, beleaguered Clash is once again called into question. — CSM.

An open letter to The Clash. The attitudes you preach are fine, the attitudes you practice stink. We have waited a long time for the Harlesden concert, palmed off with a variety of conflicting and unconvincing excuses. At last, we are told that the event would take place on Saturday 14th, yesterday. We made the journey, 90 minutes each way and arrived to find the place in darkness. Outside, a small notice that The Clash would not be appearing until October 25th and 26th.

Tell me: 1) Why no explanation for the hundreds who turned up? 2) Why no announcement in last week's music press? 3) Can there really be any explanation rather than laziness?

So Strummer cried for his fans in the Glasgow jail, did he? Well, try crying for me and the money and time I've wasted acting on false information. This "one-off" date is now stretched to two nights as just part of the major tour, so the "event" becomes just a "gig", as presumably there will be more tickets available for the second night.

"Denny you're such a liar, you won't know the truth if it hits you in the eye." Angry Robert Smith, Warrington, Surrey. Say it again. The Clash try harder than most, and they screw up more than most. I believe that the ballups hurt them as much as you, otherwise they wouldn't have made the effort to show up in Harle. don't let us per last week's T-Zet and Thrill's reportage. They deserve a little more leeway than you're giving them — just for trying. — CSM.

Does anyone out there even remember King Crimson? Lonely Fan, Loughborough. More often than I'd like — King what? — Boz Burrell.

Sid Vicious is innocent. Self mutilation freak, London. There's a first time for everything. — CSM.

Be it known that we admire Ms. Burchill's steadfast dedication to music, her impeccable grasp of musical criticism, her biting social comment. But what we really appreciate is the way she gets up arseholes like "Philip Bird" (whatever that is). Carry on Julie, we love you. Frank & Trev, Penarth. Sorry, gents. Take two? — CSM.

I've bin' readin' a lot about Bowie's "Stage" album in your bloody rag lately, especially on the letters page an' I'd just like to say that I saw Bowie on his last night at Glasgow Apollo an' it was 100 times better (songwise) than the live album set, so don't any of you bums out there who've never seen the man be put off goin' to do so in the future by listenin' to this recent pressin' — okay? An' what Julie Burchill said about "Stage" was pretty much right — it's no real reflection of Bowie's abilities — so sad the lot of ye. Jock Revolta.

The Last Bag...

...until next week possibly. Then again, maybe (Oh shut up and get on with it — Ed.)

Dear Tony Parsons, Julie Burchill, Nick Kent, CSM, Monny Smiff, Pennie Smith, Brian B. Steve Clarke, Angus MacKinnon, Paul Rambali, Mick Farrow, Max Bell, Fred Dellar, Chris Salewicz, Cliff White, Lester Bangs, Tony Benyon, Brian Case, Phil McNeill and Neil Spencer — can you each lend me a penny to buy next week's New Musical Express?

Jim (whist-weary) Brooks, Dagenham.

Micky doesn't work here any more, and Lester's centless in New York. That leaves you with 18p. Tough. huh? — CSM.

I bet if I told you Mick Jelly of the Late Show taught at my school and used to keep me in to read my NME you wouldn't believe me.

Alf The Vet, Sidcup, Kent. I believe you, I believe you. I couldn't give a shit, but I believe you. — CSM.

Our Lord's Prayer

Our father Who art in New Jersey Springsteen be thy name From backstreets you come A baby born to run In Asbury Park As I am in Orpingdon Give us this day our daily gallon of four star As we forgive old Bill who nickes us Lead us not into speed traps And deliver us from green lights

For thine is the highway The Chevy and the Buick For ever and ever Drive on! Flash Springclean (Boy Race), Orpingdon, Kent. And now to an item of real general interest — CSM.

My friend has just completed last week's crossword in 3 mins. 2 secs. I think he's great, but he won't tell me his secret. Can you help?

A Confused Sheepshagger, Welshpool, Powys. See next letter — CSM.

If next week's questions have been published with this week's crossword, then will next week's crossword use this week's answers? If so, where are the answers to last week's which I did this week... why, and does it matter anyway? Ximenes, Hillingdon, Middlesex. See previous letter — CSM.

Before the Oct. 14th issue I wouldn't have given Tony Parsons shit for toothpaste; but that Springsteen article, what! Fucking nice one! We know Bruce is the one. Street music? He makes Willy DeVille and the rest sound like they got agoraphobia. Mark, Ealing, W13. Madmen, strummers, bummers... oh, sorry. Drifted off for a sec. — CSM.

At last I've read a truly great piece of writing in your NME. Tony Parsons said it all about the Broooooose, as a Springsteen fanatic I was engrossed with his 3 page exploration of how the Bruce got his heartstrings to the light of musical pleasure. I've got the thermos and dross bag ready for when the tickets go on sale here. J. Peragroon, Fife. And the plaudits keep on comin'... — CSM.

I think that the NME Book Of Rock is a useful, relevant and informative guide to the music of the 70s. I shall certainly be keeping mine for posterity (until they bring one out on the 80s). Music isn't just for pleasure. I suppose it gives you pleasure to hear about someone being beaten up in a tube station or a man being unjustly imprisoned or a woman being raped... Music is also for pain, sorrow, joy, hatred, etc., etc., et al.

Terry Smith (G. Bag last week) seems to think that the NME is thrust down your throat every week. If you don't like it, don't read it. Read something else or why not start your own music paper if you feel that strongly about it. I think the profits you talk of are IPC's not NME's (damn right, bub — CSM).

Maybe these aren't the glorious and hallowed 1960's but you compare the present UK musical output to that of the USA. You can jerk off to Foreigner, Kiss, Van Halen, Boston, Aerosmith all you want whilst others can listen to what The Jam, Clash, Elvis Costello have to say about the world as they see it as well as producing "good" music. Chick Corea is no doubt a good musician but he can keep his funky up chromatic scales as far as I'm concerned because they are worthless, they have no meaning, they pass no comment on life as such. I don't understand this wonderful "language" you talk about. I understand what people might say through the music they have created. Music isn't some untouchable god as you make it sound, though in the hands of someone like Mr. Corea it is as useless as a stone idol.

William Shakespeare wrote plays not music, he belongs to another time so leave him there in context.

If you were a person of any principles you would stop buying NME now. Instead you buy it for things you mentioned you dislike about it. Typically hip — perverse. Of course your letter would not be complete without a ritual slagging off of that happy couple T.P. and J.B. At the very least they provoke thought even if you hate them for it. I don't remember reading about Julie Burchill's sexual problems. It's only what your mind reads into what she writes. I shouldn't think Tony Parsons would want to write for your school rag, they are invariably pathetic, elitist, crap. If you can write better articles than him then prove it you bloody hero. (Hey look lads I gotta letter printed in NME gosh, swoon, cheer, whiz, bang). Chris Warren (Hip, Middle Class Liberal pseud). Okay... jokes straight through 'til the end. 1-2-3-4! — CSM.

Is the XTC dub single really supposed to be played at 45 rpm? Because it sounds better at 33.

Andy Cartridge, Swindon I won't be 33 until 1984, Andy, but I'll ask Al Clark — CSM.

Why the hell are records made so loud — it annoys the neighbours.

A Public Nuisance, Keel — where? What? — The geazer in the flat below.

This week's Bag edited by CHARLES SHAAR MURRAY Address all letters to NME, 5-7 Carnaby St., London W1V 1PG.

T-ZERS

DOES ITS HOMEWORK

THIS MAY come as something of a shock to all you wholesome popkids who picked up this week's fab ish of NME (all the features, fax, fotos and fun we can squeeze in between the ads) in the hope of hippping yourselves to all the latest peachy info about your faves — where they buy their shoes, whether they're bright, amusing and clean-cut first t'ing in the morning an' t'ing — but despite the admirably comforting air of total niceness emanating from Rachel Sweet in the big pic, this week's instalment of T-Zers is straight from Sleaze Central.

It's disgusting. It's nasty. It hasn't shaved. It feels dreadful. It exudes an almost palpable aura of sheer malevolence. It wants to upset people. It's basically rather unpleasant. It's designed to annoy.

You guessed! This week's T-Zers has bad breath! After reading it, you too will have bad breath! And that, logically enough, brings us to tortured Stone Keith Richards fighting his battle against heroin, Mounties, the Daily Mirror, etc., etc. If you're following this epic saga in the National Press, you know more about the outcome of Keef's legals than we do, but it's interesting to note that one of the 46 (count 'em) clauses in the Stones' current contract with EMI specifically relates to any situation which might arise if any member of the group might, by some bolt-from-the-blue fluke of fate, not be able to perform...

Naturally, T-Zers hasn't the foggiest notion what said clause actually states, and even less idea why Jagger and his platoon of lawyers insisted that such an odd clause be inserted in the contract in the first place. Still, of Rubber Hipp has his own problems. He bought Jerry Hall, a $24,000 diamond-and-emerald ring and the elongated boiler lost the trinket within 24 hours while out jogging. T-Zers' Department Of Logic, Truth and Higher Mathematics works this out at slightly over a grand an hour for use of the ring.

Meanwhile, the Stones (as we showbiz insiders usually refer to them) gave a singularly unimpressive performance on NBC-TV's Saturday Night Live. The US TV audience was reportedly thrilled to the marrow by a trio of songs from "Some Girls" and a few mindless skits involving Greek restaurants, dancing lessons from Jagger and assorted foolishness involving Ron Wood. Frankly, we're disgusted with the example these alleged entertainers set to young folks today.

Luscious Linda Ronstadt discovered how much her new album was appreciated by her true fans when her Malibu pad got burgled the other week. Those of Ms. Piggy's possessions which the villains couldn't shift were slashed to ribbons. Linda now knows how it feels to be a songwriter...

The nosy Nikon of PAUL SLATTERY catches RACHEL SWEET earnestly pursuing educational opportunities. While you sexist bastards slaver over Rumbustious Rachel, she's slaving over her homework. Tough life, innit?

MEANWHILE, in the same sunny state of California, John Travolta (the actor, singer and dancer) has purchased a million-dollar house in Studio City and, for approximately the same amount of money, a 14-acre estate in Santa Barbara. If you wanna learn how to make that much money (Dave Robinson, this means you), then you could always enroll for a mere $50 in the Church Of Scientology's Seminar For Agents And Actors which Trevira is currently endorsing. It's sponsored, natch, by the C of S Celebrity Centre...

About time too: National Front leader Martin Webster is to appear in court in charges of (surprise! surprise!) incitement to racial hatred. Two summonses relating to Section 59 of the Race Relations Act were served on the contemptible oaf relating to recent issues of National Front News...

Johnny Thunders was seen soooooo alone (i.e. without his minder) flogging copies of his own album at a secondhand record shop in London last week. We know what it's like to need to suddenly lay your hands on a specific some of money, John, but if you keep flooding the market like this, what are we supposed to do with our copies?...

Gen X singer Billy Idol was a spectator at Andrew Logan's Alternative Miss World Contest held in a giant tent on Clapham Common last week, but we are reliably informed that he was not a contender

(the whole point of this contest is that all competitors are drag artists). Meanwhile, his cuddly colleague Mark Laff (drums, ex-IPC messenger), who has reportedly been soaking up two bottles of spirits a day, has been dispatched to a seaside Health Farm to get dried out in time for the band's U.K. tour next month...

So this is what he does when we allow him a fortnight's holiday: someone with the unlikely name of Neil Spencer was answering questions on Celtic History on last week's Mastermind.

SOME girls gave birth: Honest Ron Wood once again tastes the joys of paternity. Jo Howard, who has been cohabiting with Ron since he split up with his wife Chrissie, gave birth to a baby girl last week. Ron and Jo had been hoping to get spiced before the arrival, but congrats anyway, youse two.

It's a tough life in the fame game especially when you're lat year's macho: Sylvester (rocky) Stallone was mucho miffola when he was barred from Muhammad Ali's dressing room after the recent championship fight, while L. John Travolta was allowed to steam straight in. Stallone contained his ire for a full half-hour before giving up and pissing off...

This'll really catch you unawares: after finishing off the U.S. section of their world tour with a gig at Santa Monica Civic Auditorium, during which Doobie Jeff Judas Priest lead singer Rob Halford has obtained a 12-foot whip for use on the band's next tour. We always thought that heavy metal was simply a reassurance device for the chronically inadequate, but this is ridiculous...

And the week's real shock news: Raped are changing their name. Not, as you might have thought, to Bugged but to Wolfling. "It's an awful name, isn't it?" remarked Faebhen Kwest (satanism, dyed hair, guitar). "We're going to become a nice normal safe bane like Queen and Foreigner and sing songs about fat-assed girls, because no-one is prepared to give us a chance as Raped." Remember: the name is Wolfling. Formerly Raped. Stop laughing at the back there.

This is a distress call: Gloria Mundi had £1,400 worth of gear nicked between 7-11 pm on October 15 at rehearsals near Tower Bridge. Their main concern is a sunburst Rickenbacker 4001 bass with black and white edging. The usual no-questions-asked reward deal can be discussed if you call 01-584 4634...

WHOO's a big bad punk-rocker then: L.A. punk club Madame Wong's recently enjoyed a full house for W. Coast cropheads 20-20. The enthusiastic person who got out of control and ended up ass-first on the sidewalk outside was none other than deaf, bearded, overweight Beached Boy Brian Wilson.

Other California punks in the news are Crime (Lou Reed offered to produce them after he saw them dressed up in their cop suits but before he heard 'em. Knowing Loopy Lou, he could probably produce them without hearing them) who played San Quentin recently. The warden's repudiations over the effects of songs like "Murder By Guitar" and "Dillinger's Brain" on the Jailbirds were surpassed by those of the band when they learned of San Quentin's "No Hostage Rules", whereby the prison declines to accept responsibility for the safety of visitors who get taken hostage by the captives (any chance of The Doobies playing Quentin? Pity)...

Baxter and Clover's Huey Lewis jammed. Thin Lizzy actually had a party!!! Guess who showed up: The Runaways!!! Steve Jones!!! Al Kooper!!! The Doobie Brothers!!! Even Linda Blair was there, and we are reliably informed that she spent some time discussing religion with Phil the Fluter himself (no cheap cracks in T-Zers, Jack!). The Lizzies' next project was to set off for Australia (the trip was uneventful except that two roadies got chucked off the plane for misbehaving — not, presumably, while the plane was in flight) where they proceeded to disrupt Parliament by sound-checking rather loudly (Parliament's next door to the gig, dig)... Delusions of adequacy:

In case you can't decipher the nifty lettering on VIVIENNE WESTWOOD's touching T-shirt tribute to SID, it reads: "She's dead. I'm alive. I'm yours." Viv thinks that's pretty creative. PAUL YULE snapped the snap.

Hi! I am a very small space that's normally filled up with advertisements and suchlike, and it's a pleasure to have this opportunity to speak out about things that really matter. You may think that us small spaces don't really have a lot to say but good things often come in small packages. Did you know that most pop stars are in fact a bunch of bloody midgets? It's only the illusion of power conferred on them by stage lighting and grotesque shoes that keeps their secret. In next week's small space, we blow the gaff on the real truth of the Pink Floyd.

Wet Dream
