NEWS

ELVIS COSTELLO

Richard Hell

30 BIG DATES BY COSTELLO

ELVIS COSTELLO & The Attractions begin a major 30-venue British tour immediately after Christmas. After completing their previously-reported seven-night stint at London's Dominion Theatre (December 18-24), they'll have only Christmas Day and Boxing Day for a breather before setting out on their nationwide trek. And so intensive is their tour schedule that they have only four free days between December 27 and the end of January.

A special bonus for all audiences, both during the pre-Christmas Dominion season and on the subsequent tour dates, is that the show will feature two strong support acts. US band, Richard Hell & The Voidoids — currently without a record label, after surprisingly being ditched by Sire — fly in specially for the tour. And the bill is completed by John Cooper Clarke, who's at last making an impact through his album "Disguise in Love".

Costello himself will have his third album, titled "Armed Forces", released by Radar Records on January 5 to coincide with the tour. Included in the initial pressing will be a live three-track EP, recorded at Hollywood High School during the band's third American tour in June and containing "Alison", "Accidents Will Happen" and "Watching The Detectives".

Promoted by Straight Music, the tour is Costello's first since his "This Year's Model" outing in the spring. Dates are:

Brighton Top Rank (December 27), Portsmouth Guildhall (28), Bath Pavilion (29), Canterbury Odeon (30), Oxford New Theatre (31), Hemel Hempstead Pavilion (January 2), Ipswich Gaumont (4), Birmingham Odeon (5), Derby Assembly Rooms (6), Liverpool Empire (7), Manchester Free Trade Hall (8), Bradford St. George's Hall (9), Newcastle City Hall (11), Glasgow Apollo (12), Aberdeen Capitol (13), Dundee Caird Hall (14), Edinburgh Odeon (15), Carlisle Market Hall (16), Preston Guildhall (17), Sheffield City Hall (18), Henley Victoria Hall (19), Leeds University (20), Coventry Theatre (21), Leicester De Montfort Hall (22), Oldham Civic Hall (23), Taunton Odeon (26), Exeter University (26), Cardiff Sophia Gardens (27), Bristol Locarno (28) and Southampton Gaumont (29).

STUDENTS BAN PUBLIC, SO Clash discard Glasgow gigs

THE CLASH have cancelled their two scheduled concerts at Glasgow Strathclyde University on December 4 and 5. They say they had stipulated that members of the public should be admitted to these gigs — which, they claim, was not adhered to by the Students Union.

It seems that Joe Strummer was making a personal appearance in a Glasgow record shop last week, when he was told of the situation. He immediately went to the university, hitching a lift on the back of a motor-bike, and tried to buy a ticket for the show — only to be told he couldn't without producing a S.U. card. He informed promoter Ian Flukes of the Derek Block Agency, who said he felt he had been deceived and called off the dates right away. He's now trying to schedule alternative gigs in Glasgow before Christmas.

At press-time, details of the band's London dates next month were still awaited.

THREE NEW GEN X VENUES

Rats add Rainbow

BOOMTOWN RATS have added a second major London concert to their "Seasonal Turkey Tour", announced two weeks ago. They are already to headline at the Hammersmith Odeon on December 7, and this show sold out within hours of the box office opening. As a result, they have now added an appearance at London's Rainbow Theatre on Friday, December 15, which becomes the final date in their pre-Christmas itinerary.

Dublin band The Vipers support on all tour dates.

● GENERATION X have slotted another three dates into their British tour itinerary, reported two weeks ago. They are Leeds Fan Club at Brannigan's (December 11), Dunstable California Ballroom (12) and Colchester Woods Leisure Centre (13). They have also switched their Manchester gig from the Mayflower Club on December 15 to The Factory next Monday (27).

● JOHNNY RUBBISH, whose Christmas single "Santa's Alive" is released this weekend by United Artists, is the support act in two big London gigs during the next few days — with Japan at Strand Lyceum (this Sunday) and with Pere Ubu at Camden Electric Ballroom (next Tuesday, 28).

● THE LURKERS headline two London shows at Camden's Electric Ballroom on Sunday, December 10. The first is a matinee for under-16's (from 3 to 6 pm) with tickets at 80p, and it's followed by an evening show (starting 7.30 pm) for over-16's with admission £2. Promoters are Straight Music.

● THE DOOMED, the revamped version of The Damned, are playing two special pre-Christmas gigs in London — the first at Camden Electric Ballroom on December 21, and the second in the suburbs at Croydon Greyhound on Christmas Eve. Other dates for the band include Belfast The Pound (November 30 and December 1), Liverpool Eric's (8), Manchester Russell Club (9), Aberdeen Ruffles (14), Edinburgh Clouds (15) and Birmingham Barberella's (19).

● ADVERTISING, absent from the gig circuit for several months due to drummer Paul Bullitt's hearing problems, play their first live date since the summer at London Regent's Park Bedford College tomorrow (Friday).

Rod: three more shows set

ROD STEWART has now added three more dates to his previously-reported U.K. tour next month, making 16 shows in all. He plays a second concert at the new 15,000 capacity Birmingham National Exhibition Centre on December 17, and two extra performances at London Olympia after Christmas — on Thursday and Friday, December 28 and 29.

Birmingham tickets are all at the one price of £5, and mail orders should be sent to BHM, P.O. Box 40, London W1A 4LO. For the two London gigs, only £6 and £3 seats are available, the intermediate prices having already been sold on the strength of applications outstanding from Rod's first three Olympia concerts — write to BHM Concerts, c/o Olympia, Hammersmith Road, London W11. For both Birmingham and London, make cheques and POs payable to "BHM".

Box offices for Rod's shows at Leicester Granby Hall (December 8 and 9) and Brighton Centre (11-13), previously restricted to postal booking, are now also open to personal applicants.

● RALPH McTELL headlines a one-off London concert at Drury Lane Theatre Royal on Sunday, December 3, with special guest John Williams. Tickets are on sale now priced £3.50, £3, £2.50 and £1.50. Promoter is John Martin in association with Capital Radio, who are recording it for subsequent broadcast.

Tosh extra

PETER TOSH has now confirmed the final date for his short British tour next month — it's at Bradford St. George's Hall on Tuesday, December 5. It's also been announced that Matumbi will be the support act on all the Tosh dates, the others being Manchester Apollo (3), Cardiff Sophia Gardens (4) and London Rainbow (6 and 7).

LIZZY'S YULETIDE LONDON CONCERT

THIN LIZZY headline a special one-off Christmas concert at London Hammersmith Odeon on Sunday, December 17. They hadn't intended to do any more shows this year, but decided to slot in this one gig as a seasonal offering to their fans. Support act is Irish band The Undertones, currently touring with The Rezillos. Tickets are priced £4, £3.50, £3 and £2.50, and are on sale now at the box office and through the usual agencies.

HARVEY: GLASGOW XMAS SHOWCASE

ALEX HARVEY and his new band, who made their stage debut at London's new The Venue earlier this month, have confirmed a special one-off Christmas concert in Harvey's native Scotland — at the Glasgow Apollo on Saturday, December 16.

At present tickets are available only by post from the Apollo Box Office, Renfield Street, Glasgow, and they are priced £3, £2.50, £2 and £1.50 (make cheques and POs payable to the Apollo). It's Harvey's first appearance in Scotland for two years, and it follows a European tour by the band beginning this weekend. As previously reported, they are being lined up for a full British tour in the New Year.

Streetband tour

STREETBAND play their own headlining tour next month, coinciding with the chart success of their single "Toast" and previewing their debut Logo album "London", due out in February. With further dates still being finalised, confirmed gigs are Sheffield Totley College (December 5), London Marquee (8), London Wimbledon Arts Centre (7), Hatfield Polytechnic (8), Manchester Polytechnic (9), Plymouth Woods (12), Exeter Routes (13), Bristol Granary (14), Dudley J.B.'s (16), Newbridge Club and Institute (17), Swansea Circles (18), Leeds Brannigan's (20), Sheffield Limit Club (21) and Kirkclevington Country Club (22).

PUBLIC IMAGE PLAN MORE APPEARANCES

PUBLIC IMAGE LTD are expected to undertake a series of selected dates in the New Year, after their debut concerts at London Rainbow over the Christmas holiday. A spokesman for Virgin Records told NME: "Providing the Rainbow gigs go smoothly, the plan is for more shows early next year — not a tour as such, but a series of one-off appearances."

Virgin also denied reports elsewhere, suggesting that the band will be doing a string of secret unadvertised gigs during the next couple of weeks, as a warm-up for the Rainbow dates.

"The band have now started intensive rehearsals but, at this moment, have no plans for any pre-Rainbow gigs — secret or otherwise — even though we personally feel it would be quite a good idea", says the record company.

JACKSONS SET FOR FEBRUARY

HOT ON THE HEELS of their return to chart favour with the single "Blame It On The Boogie", The Jacksons have been signed for a British concert tour in the New Year. They'll be here from February 10 to 25 inclusive, playing at least 12 major dates during that time, as well as TV appearances.

The only venue so far confirmed is London Rainbow Theatre where they headline on February 23 and 24, but their full itinerary — including gigs in Manchester, Birmingham, Sheffield and Bristol — will be announced in a week or two.

The group are bringing over the full entourage of their spectacular U.S. touring revue, and they'll be playing dates in Europe on either side of their British schedule.

Although an extremely expensive act, a spokesman for the promoter said The Jacksons have agreed to play double performances at most venues, in order to keep ticket prices at a reasonable level. Their new album "Destiny" is released this week by Epic Records.

Ants invade Rainbow as new series starts

ADAM & THE ANTS top the bill in the first of a series of budget-price new-wave nights at London Rainbow on Wednesday, December 13. America's Pure Hell are special guests, and the bill also includes U.K. Subs, Menace and Mothers Pride, with two or three other bands still to be set. The series is being lined up by Jock MacDonald, who is promoting the Public Image gigs at the Rainbow over Christmas, and he intends pegging top ticket price to £1.60. He's currently negotiating with Generation X to headline the second show, just before Christmas.

Runaways newcomer

THE RUNAWAYS have undergone yet another line-up change, following their major personnel upheaval a year ago. Vicki Blue, who came into the all-girl band in 1977 as replacement for Jackie Fox, has herself now left — though the reasons for her departure aren't yet known. Taking over from Vicki is 21-year-old Laurie McAllister (on the left of our main picture plus inset), who hails from California but has never before played in a band. The change occurred some weeks ago, and the girls are already back in action in the States with their new member — so the proposed British tour by The Runaways. In the late winter or early spring, should still go ahead as planned.

Oldfield's six London shows

DETAILS OF Mike Oldfield's major London concerts in the spring were announced this week. He's playing six big shows, all with full orchestra and chorus, showcasing music from all his albums. Every performance will last over two hours, and details are as follows:

● Royal Festival Hall, April 21. Two shows at 6.15 and 9 pm. Tickets £5, £4.45, £3.50, £2.75 and £1.20.

● Wembley Conference Centre, April 25 and 26. One show each night at 8 pm. Tickets £5, £4, £3 and £2.

● Wembley Arena (formerly Empire Pool), April 28 and 29. One show each night at 8 pm. Tickets £4.25, £3.75 and £2.75.

Tickets are not yet available at box-offices, but mail order bookings will be accepted immediately at the promoter's office — Mike Oldfield Box-Office, c/o Andrew Miller, 1A Craven Terrace, London W.2 (phone 01-402 6262). Enclose cheque or PO (not cash) made payable to "Mike Oldfield Box-Office" and s.a.e. Tickets will not be dispatched until the end of January.

RADIO BIRDMAN BREAK UP

RADIO BIRDMAN, the Australian rock band who toured Britain earlier this year with The Flamin' Groovies and were signed by Sire Records, have broken up — apparently due to "personal and musical differences". Bassist Warwick Gilbert and guitarist Chris Masuak have already formed a new band called Johnny and The Hitmen. And the other two members, lead guitarist Deniz Tek and singer Rob Younger, are also assembling a new outfit — which could prove to be a re-shaped version of Birdman.

NEW-LOOK U.K. CARRY ON

U.K., the all-star band launched earlier this year in a blaze of publicity, have already lost two of their founder members — Bill Bruford is forming his own band to tour in his own right, and he's also started work on his second solo album for New Year release; and Allan Holdsworth has quit to pursue a solo career. But U.K. are not disbanding — remaining members John Watson and Eddie Jobson have now been joined by ex-Mothers Of Invention drummer Terry Bozio, and together they're recording a new album for February release. A British tour will follow.

CHAS AND DAVE STRUM ON

CHAS AND DAVE continue on the rounds next month, promoting their current EMI single "Strummin'", now a strong chart contender following its recent "Top Of The Pops" exposure. Their December gigs confirmed so far are London North-East Polytechnic (2), London Kensington Nashville (5), Bath University (8), North Greenford Football Club (9), East Sussex College (11), Birmingham Polytechnic (12), London Wimbledon Nelson's Club (13), London Central Polytechnic (14) and Harrow Borough Football Club (24). More are being set.

TAPPER ZUKIE: EXTRA GIGS

TAPPER ZUKIE has now been confirmed for another five dates next month. In addition to his previously-reported gig at Manchester Mayflower (December 7) and his major London concert at the Rainbow (16). He now also plays Cardiff Top Rank (5), Dunstable California (9), Liverpool Eric's (11), Cromer West Runton Pavilion (15) and Edinburgh Tiffany's (18). And it's likely that further dates will be added to his itinerary, including a probable second night at London Rainbow on December 17.

HAWKINS VISIT IN MARCH

RONNIE HAWKINS — the Canadian rock'n'roll star who was forced to cancel a headlining London appearance earlier this month, due to the recurrence of a heart condition — is now being lined up for a British visit in March, when he will play two London shows and three major provincial dates. He's currently convalescing in Toronto, and his London promoter doesn't anticipate any problems about the projected March visit. It's also expected that Hawkins will record while he's here.

SKREWDRIVER BACK ON TOUR

SKREWDRIVER are back on the road this week for a short but hectic tour. They visit Derby College of Technology (tonight, Thursday), Nottingham Boat Club (this Saturday), Manchester Mayflower with Slade (Sunday), Halifax Good Mood (November 27), Huddersfield Polytechnic (28), London Camden Music Machine (29), Reading Bones Club (30), Edinburgh Clouds (December 2), Dundee Royal Centre Hotel (3) and Leeds Fan Club (6). Further December dates are still being lined up.

AFTER THE FIRE IN ACTION

After The Fire drummer IVOR TWIDELL

AFTER THE FIRE, one of the busiest bands on the gig circuit, are already setting up a six-week New Year tour to promote their debut single "One Rule For You, One Rule For Me" due out in January. The itinerary concentrates on colleges, interspersed with a handful of clubs, and the first dates to be confirmed are Stafford North Staffs Polytechnic (January 5), Leeds Florde Green Hotel (7), Sheffield Limit Club (9), Hatfield Polytechnic (12) and Derby Bishop Lonsdale College (13). The tour ends in mid-February, and a new album is set for late March release coinciding with a short concert tour.

TROGGS IN LONDON SEASON

THE TROGGS return from their current triumphant tour of South America at the beginning of next month, and are set for a four-day pre-Christmas season at London's new-look Greyhound in Fulham (December 14-17 inclusive). Other December gigs for the band are at Edinburgh Harriet Watt University (8), Sunderland Polytechnic (9), Basildon Sweeney's Disco (19) and Yeovil Rugby Club (20), and further dates are at present being finalised.

"Well they said anything could happen."

Remember whatever happens, don't overdo it.

Roxy reunion: LP and tour

AFTER MONTHS of rumour and speculation, it's now officially confirmed that Roxy Music are back together again, and about to launch a major comeback with a new album and world tour. In a surprise move revealed this week, it was learned that ex-Vibrators bassist Gary Tibbs has joined original members Bryan Ferry, Phil Manzanera, Andy Mackay and Paul Thompson.

And now that Eddie Jobson is unavailable because of his commitments with U.K., a synthesiser and keyboard player has still to be added to the line-up — and it's understood that it could conceivably be Eno.

The band recently completed recording a new album at the island studios, and they are now mixing it in New York, with a view to January release. Then in the New Year they begin an extensive comeback tour of the world, taking in Britain, Europe, America, Japan and Australia — though it's not yet certain in which order those territories will be visited. For more on the Roxy reunion, see this week's centre spread.

DANNY & JUNIORS MAKE U.K. DEBUT

DANNY & THE JUNIORS, the near-legendary American band whose "At The Hop" rates as one of the classic rock singles of all time, are coming over in the New Year for their first-ever British visit. They'll be appearing at London Southgate Royal on January 11 in one of a series of special rock'n'roll revival nights, to be presented at the venue during the first quarter of 1979.

Johnny & The Hurricanes, of "Red River Rock" fame, will also be showcased in the same series — on February 15. The band, still featuring leader Johnny Parrish and the other three founder members, were originally due here this autumn but have now postponed their visit until the New Year.

Both bands will also be undertaking other one-nighters around the country, and full details of their separate itineraries are expected shortly.

The rock revival series at London Royal starts on New Year's Day with a 12-hour show featuring Marty Wilde, who reverts to his original rock style to headline with The Wildcats. Also appearing are Matchbox, The Flying Saucers, The Shades, The Jets and the Wild Wax Show.

MARTY ROBBINS

CRYSTAL GAYLE AT WEMBLEY Easter Country Festival lined up

PROMOTER Mervyn Conn this week confirmed details of his 11th International Festival of Country Music, to be staged — as usual — at London's Wembley Arena for three days over the Easter period. The line-up comprises:

Saturday, April 14: Marty Robbins, Billie Jo Spears, Ronnie Prophet, Hank Locklin, Freddie Hart, Dottie, Hank Williams' Original Drifting Cowboys, Billy Armstrong, The Duffy Brothers, Philomena Begley and Poacher.

Sunday, 15: Tammy Wynette, Ronnie Millsap, Moe Bandy, Freddie Fender, Barbara Fairchild, Vernon Oxford, Charlie McCoy, Floyd Cramer, Buddy Emmons, Don Gibson, Jena Jee and Jeannie Denver.

Monday, 16: Crystal Gayle, Bobby Bare, Asleep At The Wheel, Joe Stampley, Mickey Newbury, The Mercey Brothers, Jim & Jesse & The Virginia Boys, Raymond Froggatt, Nancy Peppers, Loney Smallwood and Randy Barlow.

Negotiations are also taking place for appearances by Conway Twitty and Tom T. Hall, among others. Compete throughout the three days will be Ronnie Prophet.

So. Farewell then old masthead. This is the new one:

Good, isn't it? You can get your own copy of the new masthead free with your NME next week. And every week.

● A massive TV advertising campaign, the biggest ever mounted by Artists, is being launched to promote the album of Showaddywaddy's "Greatest Hits 1976-78" which comes out this weekend. It follows their first "Greatest Hits" set issued at the end of 1976, and includes such subsequent chart entries as "When", "You Got What It Takes", "Dancin' Party", "I Wonder Why", "A Little Bit Of Soap" and "Pretty Little Angel Eyes". The LP also marks the fifth anniversary of the band's formation, and they still retain the original eight-piece line-up.

● Among singles out this weekend are "Mirrors" by Sally Oldfield from her current album (Bronze), The Shadows' version of "Don't Cry For Me Argentina" (EMI), "I'll Put You Together Again" by Hot Chocolate (Rak), "Cool Meditation" by Third World (Island) and the seasonal "Do You Hear What I Hear" by Gladys Knight & The Pips (Buddah).

● Charlie Dore, recently signed by Island, has just finished recording her debut album in Nashville for release in February. With her backing band Back Pocket she plays her only London date for the rest of the year at Camden Dingwells on December 5.

● Polydor have signed a licensing deal with Smak Wonder Records for the release of Patriz Fitzgerald's material. At present supporting The Jam on tour, he'll be going into the studios next month to record an album and single, for early 1979 release.

● Chiswick Records, now distributed by EMI, launch a new label called Ace this month. It's been formed to handle releases of original material from the '50s and '60s, and the first two albums are 14-track samplers of classic New Orleans rock called "The Ace Story — Volume One and Two". They retail at £2.99 each and feature such artists as Frankie Ford, Jimmy Clinton, Joe Tex, Lloyd Price, Huey Smith and Junior Gordon. Also out this month are two ten-inch albums, again selling at £2.99 — "White Lightning" by George Jones and "Texas Rockabilly" by Sonny Fisher.

● The new album by Tavares — whose British tour, starting this Saturday, was exclusively reported by NME three weeks ago — is titled "Madame Butterfly" and set for December 1 release by Capitol. Their new single "Never Had A Love Like This Before" is out this week.

● "Judge Dredd's Greatest Hits" is released on December 1 by EMI, who have just signed him to a contract. His double A-side Christmas single, "Judge Dredd/The Hokey Cokey", is out this week.

OFF THE RECORD

Eagles single to challenge Boney

BONEY M's new single "Mary's Boy Child" — which, as reported last week, is released tomorrow (Friday) — is claimed by WEA to have the highest advance order figure of all time in Britain. Last weekend the advance was already in excess of 400,000, and WEA say they have checked with all the other major companies, who confirm that this figure has never been equalled. It looks certain to ensure the group not only another No. 1 hit, but also a Gold Disc in record time.

Competing for seasonal honours are The Eagles, whose newly-recorded single "Please Come Home For Christmas" is released by WEA on December 1. It was cut in Miami with regular producer Bill Szymczyk, and the B-side is "Funky New Year".

WEA are also making available for Christmas seven bestselling catalogue albums pressed in coloured vinyl, and selling at normal price. They are "The Eagles' Greatest Hits" (green), "Led Zeppelin 4" (purple), "Fleetwood Mac" (white), Manhattan Transfer's "Pastiche" (orange), Rod Stewart's "Atlantic Crossing" (blue), Ross Royce's "In Full Bloom" (yellow) and Linda Ronstadt's "Back In The USA" (red).

● John Travolta looks set for another chart hit with his latest single issued this weekend by Midsong and titled "Greased Lightning". Other possibilities for the seasonal Top Thirty are "Christmas in Smurderland" by Father Abraham (Decca) and the annual release of the Slade perennial "Merry Xmas Everybody" (Polydor).

● The Mekons' second single is a double A-side release comprising "Where Were You?" and "I'll Have To Dance Then (On My Own)". It's issued next week by Fast Product.

Genesis LP reissued

ORIGINALLY released in 1973 and deleted 15 months ago, the album "Genesis Live" is reissued by Charisma at the beginning of next month. It's the only Genesis LP to be deleted, which coincided with their next live set "Seconds Out", but it's being reinstated due to increasing demand and to combat the number of foreign imports. The line-up featured is Peter Gabriel, Steve Hackett, Phil Collins, Mike Rutherford and Tony Banks.

PAUL MCCARTNEY

Wings greatest

ANOTHER ALBUM sure to be challenging for top honours at Christmas is the latest from Wings. Released by EMI on December 1, it's "Wings' Greatest", and it contains all their hits covering the period 1971-78. Tracks are Another Day, Silly Love Songs, Live And Let Die, Junior's Farm, With A Little Luck, Band On The Run, Uncle Albert/Admiral Halsey, Hi Hi Hi, Let 'Em In, My Love, Jet and Mull of Kintyre.

● Four-piece London band Screen Idols have been signed to a worldwide deal by WEA. Fronted by girl singer Michelle Nieldy, the line-up also features drummer Wood Woodmansey formerly with David Bowie and subsequently leader of his own U-Scan band. They start recording their first album next month, for early spring release.

● The title track from Doctor Alimantao's album "Best Dressed Chicken in Town" is released this week by Greenpeace Records, distributed by EMI. The first 5,000 copies are being pressed in "chicken-coloured" vinyl.

● With The Rubinoos' new single "Falling In Love" on release this week, Baserley Records are still hoping that the band will be coming over next month to promote it, though at press-time their visit remained unconfirmed.

● Trust Stiff Records to come up with the unexpected. Their latest single is "Too Kneez Black Bum" by Slinky Baker & The Ph Orchestra, in which the lyric consists solely of Tony Blackburn's name being repeated over and over!

● Leicestershire band The Pathetics release a three-track single next month on their own No Records label. A-side features two titles playing at 45rpm, and there's just one track on the B-side playing at 33rpm.

● Midlands band Little Ace (with whom Robert Plant jammed at a Birmingham gig two weeks ago) now have their Birds Nest single "Back Off" back in the shops, after the discovery that the original pressings were faulty. The band will have an album out in the New Year, as will their new girl singer Mo Birch who has just finished a solo set.

● London-based independent MSR Music this week issues a 12-inch disco mix by new British singer Joh Phillip, called "Jah Power". It was recorded in Jamaica, and is also the title of his upcoming New Year album.

If it was any more advanced, you'd need to go to night school.

The Aiwa AD 6900 is the most advanced machine of our range. It costs around £485.

It's so advanced it can compensate for the difference on virtually any tape, even between batches of the same brand.

It has 3 heads for simultaneous monitoring of your recording.

And full logic control, so you can switch from cue/review at the slightest touch. In fact it took us over 2 years and hundreds of listening hours to develop.

You can visit your Aiwa dealer or come to our demonstration centre and see the machine for yourself.

Apotheosis of a Rich Twit

"IT'S A load of rubbish, really," says Mike Oldfield, when he's asked to describe his new double album, "Incantations".

"There are a couple of parts in which I'm expressing myself completely, not using irrelevant stupid things like emotions. Just me. The rest, though, is rubbish."

I'm about to ask him why he thinks his latest work is rubbish when he announces, for no apparent reason: "We're all the same, by the way."

Quite apart from its curious timing, this remark seems a little strange. The conversation is taking place inside a chauffeur-driven Bentley. Not a morose to which most of us have access.

Sorry, Mike, but are you saying that everybody's the same?

"Yes", he says, very firmly. "If you also want to be in a state of absolute joy, you can be."

This comment seems to be yet another conceptual leap, but ever-polite, I quip: "You reckon?"

"Yes", says Mike, even more firmly. "It's just a choice you make."

"Is this the state you're in?" I ask.

"Yes", says Mike. Really?

"Definitely."

So how long have you been in this state?

"Well, for ever, really," he says.

"I've just been choosing not to realise it, that's all."

Oh.

AS YOU'VE probably gathered by now, Mike Oldfield is an unusual sort of chap. Some five years ago he was regarded as the undisputed future of rock 'n' roll. Five years later, it would seem fair to say that he's by no means dominating the contemporary music scene.

Mike's prominence resulted from his landmark album "Tubular Bells", which came out in 1973 and has since sold an estimated six million copies.

The significance of "Tubular Bells" was that it was the first time a rock musician had tackled a lengthy piece of instrumental music without resorting to ham-fisted dabbling with classical symphonies, orchestras, and the like.

At the time, "Tubular Bells" was hailed as a major breakthrough in rock's evolution. In the view of intellectual Sunday newspapers in particular, a knuckle-trailing rocker had finally come down from the trees and created some propah music.

Nowadays, of course, rock music's not expected to compete with highbrow stuff; and indeed, crude vigour is once more considered more virtuous than sleek sophistication.

But regardless of such ideological questions, there's little doubt that

Penny Smith

Or, how MIKE OLDFIELD finally learned to stop worrying and start hunting nookie. Tubular Balls? Only BOB EDMANDS (AMORC) has the key.

"Tubular Bells" was a brilliant piece of music. What made it even more remarkable was the fact that Oldfield was only 19 at the time he wrote and recorded it.

Not quite a prodigy on the level of Mozart, but close.

Since then, however, there have been no further surprises. Two more instrumental albums, "Hergest Ridge" and "Ommadawn", came out in 1974 and 1975. They were broadly on the same lines as "Tubular Bells", but sold in far smaller quantities.

In the last three years, Oldfield's put out a few jokey hit singles and a lavish presentation box of his three albums. Otherwise, nothing.

However this year he's finally come up with another major work, the aforementioned "Incantations", and that's how he and I happen to be sitting in a Bentley cruising gently through the London suburbs.

"Tubular Bells" was the first-ever release by Virgin Records. Just as they gave Mike Oldfield his big break, he gave them theirs. Naturally enough, they don't stunt themselves when it comes to promoting his new product.

An expensive interview scenario has been arranged. Not just the Bentley, but also a posh lunch in a pretentious French restaurant.

An American wit once said: "There is no such thing as a free lunch". And that's the view that record companies take, though they'd never be blunt enough to say so.

So here we are then, Mike. I'd just like to say, if I may, without wishing to be rude, that your new album sounds rather too obviously like a Mike Oldfield album. That well-established, distinctive sound. Do you think it's a bit conservative, perhaps?

"Conservative?" says Mike.

Well, maybe you could have tried something a bit more daring?

"Like what?"

Well, to be honest, I don't know. But there are certain things that I feel we've heard before. Perhaps you could have done something a bit different. (Different for you, that is). Some heavy rock, for example.

"Actually," says Mike, "I do play some heavy rock. On side three of the album. Definitely."

Well, maybe your idea of heavy rock is different to mine.

"By the way," says Mike, "I don't care what you think."

He says this quietly and politely. I say, also quietly and politely: "I don't mind whether you care or not."

Honours even, Mike continues: "There are new things on the album. There are full expressions of me. Not as a creature with hang-ups and emotions, as with 'Ommadawn'. Just pure self-expression."

But you've always had the opportunity to express yourself fully?

"Yes, sure I have, but I've chosen not to take it. Now, I'm choosing to take it."

So why not take it before?

"Because I was not being responsible for myself. When I was having a bad time, there was always someone else to blame. It was their fault, not mine. Now, I'm taking responsibility for myself. If I have a bad time, that's because I choose to have one."

And so the conversation has again returned to Mike Oldfield's state of mind, which proves to be the main theme of the afternoon's discussions.

The reason, you see, is that Mike Oldfield doesn't just have a new album; he also has a new personality, and he's more interested in talking about that than anything else.

FOR THE past five years, Mike Oldfield has been a virtual hermit, living alone in big houses in Herefordshire and Gloucestershire, rarely seeing more than five or six people a week — and most of those in his local pub.

He was said to have a phobia of cities so intense that on his rare visits to London he'd stay totally pissed in order to keep his anxieties at bay.

Along with this fear went a sense of unease about his own fame. If he was ever recognised by a member of the public, he would tend to back off rapidly in terror.

This social isolation was also reflected in his music.

"Tubular Bells" was all the more remarkable for being literally all his own work. He tends to play almost every note that's on his albums, relentlessly overdubbing each section and fitting it all together like some vast sonic jigsaw.

Why had he liked working in this way?

"When I was small I had a really bad time with my parents," he says. "My mother was a drug addict, and kept falling over and going into mental hospitals, and I didn't like it, so I invented music to escape into, which is a very private thing, you see."

But he ignores the question and continues.

"I also invented music so I could get very good at playing the guitar and impress people, and use it as a substitute form of communications. But I also used it as a way of retreating into my own little world."

In recent months, though, Mike Oldfield's outlook has undergone a remarkable transformation.

For one thing, he's overcome his fear of people and cities. In the last four weeks, he's been home to Gloucestershire no more than twice. Instead he's been living on a houseboat on the Thames and by all accounts having a rare old time.

When Virgin Records opened their night club "The Venue", there was some astonishment when Mike turned up and got into heavy conversations with assorted rock business worthies.

According to Al Clark, Virgin's Executive

Spokesman: "At one point, Mike was actually seen to be talking to Harvey Goldsmith, which is totally amazing. He would previously never go near a place like 'The Venue', and the idea that once there he would find anything in common to talk about with someone like Harvey Goldsmith would have been preposterous."

Mike's own account of the evening is somewhat more colourful. How had had liked Graham Parker and The Rumour, who were the opening night's act?

"To be honest," he says, "I didn't see them. At the time, I was up in the balcony having my way with a beautiful model from Club International."

The lady, we may take it, was not in the pages of the magazine at the time.

Apart from visiting night clubs and sampling exotic ladies, Mike's also adopted a new approach to less exotic aspects of his life.

Having spent the last three years working painstakingly on his new album, he suddenly decided that enough was enough and finished it off in a month. He also decided that the lure of the road was irresistible after all, and he's set up an extensive and intensive European tour, including a string of dates in London early next year.

He'd previously played in only one live performance of his work.)

Since the Mike Oldfield roadshow will involve about 50 musicians, he's faced with a task of man management on a scale that would have previously sent him screaming for a shrink.

"How does he think he'll get on?"

"Very well," he says. "I will get them under my control, and they will do what I want. No problem."

Mike rarely spoke to the press, in the past. And when he did, his long pauses between questions and answers were legendary.

"It was great fun," he confesses. "If someone asks you a question you hum and har for five minutes, they get very worked up. It was wonderful."

A good play, right?

"Yeah, a good game. Lovely."

These days, Mike's evidently keen to talk to vast numbers of journalists. This interview for the NME was but one of a string of talkfests arranged for the rock press and other interested parties.

Al Clark says: "Mike's even asked me to arrange interviews with Womans Own and Penthouse. Whatever next?"

So what's brought all this change about?

Mike says: "I was very happy having a bad time, until I became unhappy having a bad time, and I decided I'd have a good time instead."

What had made you unhappy?

"I'd been proving that everybody was a load of shit for a long time; and I kept on proving it. In fact, I proved that I was an absolute shit, and the fact that I proved it didn't make me happy any more."

You seemed to have a great distaste for people including yourself?

"No, I love people. It used to be a frustrated love. Now, it's not, and I also love myself. Also I couldn't get the idea that I am a genius, until I got the idea that I was an asshole."

So what have you decided?

"Both. Everything. Nothing."

BY THIS stage, you have probably guessed that Mike Oldfield has recently undergone some form of therapy, whether religious or secular.

His conversation has all the hallmarks of a recent convert to some new life-enhancing philosophy, and this indeed turns out to be the case.

"As I told you," he says, "I made the decision to change a couple of years ago, and I've been looking for a way of getting a big shove into it. I used a three-day seminar, a course which I did in June this year to do it."

No, Mike Oldfield has not got into TM, Scientology, Christian Science, Seventh Day Adventism, Methodism, Health and Beauty, Tap and Ballet, or any other quaint mystical phenomenon.

It seems he's succumbed to a form of therapy that's very trendy among American showbiz persons, including the likes of Carly Simon and Diana Ross.

The treatment is called

TUBULAR BALLS

"Exegesis", and appears to consist of no more than a three-day seminar at which you sit and listen to some character spouting forth about the nature of existence, how to enhance your social acceptance, the constipation-free way to better life, etc.

Mike himself seems somewhat vague about the credentials of the exegesis lecturer, who he says was "just a young guy." But he's in no doubt about the effect.

"You listen to this guy talk for three days, and all your hang-ups and all the things you're frightened of just go — wuuuuhh. It's like having a huge shit, and you've got rid of it. It's all gone, and you can be yourself then."

"It all comes flooding back later, but it's unimportant. You just deal with it."

Al Clark says he thinks the therapy is something to do with a system called Erhardt Seminar Training.

Erhardt was an American psychologist who dreamt the system up. "It has clearly worked for Mike," Al says, and indeed this is difficult to argue with.

As well as changing his personality, Mike Oldfield has changed his appearance. He's cut off his hippie hair and beard, and opted for expensive casual wear. In fact, he's become a sports-jacket sort of chap.

"Well," he says, "when I left school I took off my school uniform and swapped it for a hippie uniform instead."

But now you're wearing a successful young man's uniform.

"Yes, I am. I bought it yesterday. Do you like it?" (No.)

Mike Oldfield also takes impolite remarks without offence. All thanks, no doubt, to his new found cure-all.

The trouble is that this personality prop seems to involve ignoring everyday truths. For example, his opinion that "There is no such thing as luck, no such things as accidents". These propositions are plainly false. If pushed, Mike will also tell you that there is no such thing as injustice or oppression.

According to him, anyone can do anything they want to, if they really want to. We're all Superhuman, even if we look like Clark Kent, or even Al Clark.

Why is it a great revelation, Mike, that a rock millionaire can enjoy life?

"Because I have given myself a very fucked-up head, which can be very enjoyable. It makes things very interesting, but it stops being enjoyable."

"The difference now is that I am the context in which there are problems, instead of being a problem myself."

Do you regret your previous attitude?

"There's no way I regret anything. There's no way I can make a mistake. I get exactly what I want even if it's bad, and I always have done..."

By this time, even my cassette player is beginning to nod out under the sheer oppressive weight of this endless litany, but it does indeed seem to have worked for Mike Oldfield.

He's even preparing to work in partnership with other musicians in the studio, and Al

Clark says he thinks that is potentially the most exciting aspect of Mike's "coming out".

You would, of course, expect record companies to enthuse over their artists' artistry, but the prospect clearly has great possibilities.

What are Mike's plans?

"There's three things I want to do. I wanna write and sing a really beautiful love song, because I know I could. And I wanna do a disco thing, because I've just discovered that my body can express itself too, and I can dance."

"I also want to do a very heavy rock thing — really heavy — bass, drums, and guitars. Oh yes, and massed voices."

That sounds like a lot of ingredients. Are they all for the one thing?

"I don't know. I don't know. I'll just mess about and see."

Punk rock does not appear to figure heavily in his plans, and he says: "It's a great thing to be the exact opposite of. A full expression of frustrated self-expression."

Equally, Mike has scant sympathy for Virgin Records' saddest protégé, Sid Vicious. In Mike's opinion, "It's very difficult to get into a situation like that unless you really want to."

A H WELL, Mike Oldfield is happy enough with his new visions. He seems very relaxed and good-natured.

When was the last time you felt this euphoric, Mike?

"When I was a kid."

It didn't last, though, did it?

"No."

So will it last this time?

"Yes," says Mike.

"Definitely."

A very positive lad is the New Mike. His Bentley dropped me off just round the corner from the NME's office in Carnaby Street, and Mike was driven on round to Bond Street to buy some jewellery.

WHATEVER HAPPENED TO PHILIP RAMBOW?

WHATEVER HAPPENED to Philip Rambow?

A year ago it finally seemed that his time was imminent.

Arriving back in England in the late summer of 1977 after fifteen months in New York washing dishes and playing the stock rounds of CBGB's and Max's, the former Winkies leader set himself up with a red-hot rock'n'roll combo featuring Mick Ronson on guitar and the splendid Dave Cochrane on bass. Chrysalis Records — The Winkies' label — renewed their interest, and clutching a fistful of rave reviews and comeback features in the rock press, Rambow was all set to go into Wessex Studios with producer Chris Thomas to cut the proverbial vinyl affirmation of his worth.

So what happened? In a word, nothing. Just four tracks materialised from the Wessex sessions — "Fallen", "Cheap Shot", "Prime Time" and "Young Lust" — and have been circulating on cassette ever since, strictly for the ears of the punkbiz elite.

"Fallen", in particular, is a marvellous rock song that reeks of emotion and bristles with hook lines. Even in its unmixed form, it was an obvious choice for a hit single.

And yet, apart from those fortunate enough to see Rambow on his two short series of London dates earlier this year, nobody has even heard those songs outside of the business.

The album was never made and now never will be. Those cassette tapes will probably be the only versions of those songs ever available: if and when Rambow manages to break free of Chrysalis Records, he will not be permitted to re-record them for five years.

Ask Philip Rambow about his relationship with Chrysalis and he'll clam up for a moment. Soon, though, vitriol pours out of him.

"I feel like being in a mental institution. Every time I do something to state my sanity the tighter the straitjacket becomes. I keep being told I mustn't criticise anyone or stir up any shit, but eventually it goes beyond that."

Rambow refers constantly to his "Catch 22" situation.

"The problem I'm involved in, is doing tracks for a company who don't like the tracks and then won't let the artist go."

"No one ever actually said to me that they didn't like those songs. The key thing here is that the record company's dumper for unsatisfactory artists is silence. They just don't tell you anything."

Andrew King, who has co-managed Rambow with his Blackhill Enterprises partner Peter Jenner for the past ten months, has had similar experiences with Chrysalis. Of their attempts to free Rambow from his contract he told Thrills: "We're trying to be involved in delicate legal negotiations with them but I'm not quite sure that they are too."

"I rather get the impression that they've lost their lawyer's phone number. I'm finding Chrysalis exceptionally difficult. They just never seem to make any decisions. It's all very annoying. Chrysalis could get enough out of it and be very happy."

Since the beginning of the year, when his weekly wages of £50 were stopped, Rambow has been in a state of complete flux — broke and becoming gradually more and more dispirited.

"I can't write songs. There's no light at the end of the tunnel. I don't feel I've been lobotomised — I've been killed."

"Because other people have not had it together businesswise, it reflects very much on me. There's only so many times you can be seen at gigs or at parties before people wonder what else you do."

Rambow's main bitch is that "Chrysalis are just inefficient".

The irony is that during the time Rambow's supposed to have been recording for Chrysalis, he has had more product out on other labels — a track apiece on the "Max's Kansas City" compilation (which was eventually put out by CBS) and on Warner Brothers' "Hope And Anchor" set from last year.

CBS USA actually wanted to sign Rambow, he claims. But under his original Winkies deal with Chrysalis he is obliged to pay off a contractual debt to the label.

"I think my right of free trade has been restricted. I can't trade my art."

Doug D'Arcy, managing director of Chrysalis Records, amicably denies all Rambow's accusations. He speaks of Rambow being "until recently under contract to us." When it is pointed out that he is still under contract, D'Arcy claims that the operations of the legal system always entail a certain statutory procrastination.

When I point out that Chrysalis weren't prepared to put Rambow's hand on wages — thus making it impossible for it to stay together — he claims not to have any knowledge of this.

When I ask him why Chrysalis haven't released any of those critically acclaimed songs, D'Arcy says he is "not very familiar" with them.

Maybe some kind soul should lend the poor chap a tape recorder. CHRIS SALEWICZ

HAVE A ROTTEN CHRISTMAS — FREE!

PICTURED left and fairly oozing sardonic splendour is the cover of the imminent Public Image Ltd long player. The speech bubble protruding from the lips of young John Lydon (whose trusted scowl looks especially nasty, doncha think?) is our own creation.

It is, as members of a certain generation will easily suss, blank. And it's just begging for someone to add a witty, hurtful, libelous, scathing or just plain dumb remark. The incentive: six pairs of tickets for the Christmas Day P.I.L. performance at London's Rainbow. The acid test: Monty Smith.

The six entries able to extract a chuckle from Monty before the pubs open on December 1 will each receive a pair of tickets. Address all correspondence to Wotta Rotten Competition, NME, 5-7 Carnaby St., London W1V 1PG.

MILITANT BARRY MEETS SID VICIOUS AT THE HIGH RISE OF KENSAL

LUNAR REGGAE lonster Militant Barrington — whose 1977 single "Free Black People" caused much controversy in local reggae circles with its contention that both Idi Amin and John Lydon first (unstaged) the Queen during Jubilee year — has now come out on behalf of maligned Dalstonian John Ritchie/Beverley for his latest waxing, "Free Sid Vicious."

Recorded for Winston Francis' Independent Gemini label, this latest play by the Militant one to grab the headlines introduces an obnoxious character styled as Judge Snottynose and contains the memorable line: "Sid Vicious is the man on trial. Who will be next? Watch out Johnny Rotten!" This is in keeping with Barrington's view that the Pistols' former bassist was framed for the murder of Mrs. Spungen by Federal Bureau of Investigation agents on account of his radical commitments and youth disenfranchisement campaign.

The Kensal Rise dread explores similar territory on an album recently completed for Ken Weston's Conflict label, including tracks such as "Jah's Man Skank", "Fight Against Racism" and "Tek Life". The latter track details the short life of a Kingston dread by the name of Tek Life who was a right-hand man of Peace hero Claudie Massop, and who was shot dead by the homeguard in Jamaica earlier this month.

POP KIDS DRUGGED UP ON FRESH AIR

A NEW MIRACLE device with sinister overtones has just gone on sale in America. Marketed as a glorified air conditioner, it is actually being used to 'peg up' unsuspecting audiences. Here's how it works:

The Ionized Oxygen Generator, as it is known, emits negative electrons into the atmosphere, which attach themselves to oxygen molecules in a process called ionization. The effect of this can be sampled by smelling the air after a thunderstorm. "You feel great, revitalised and alert," runs the wording in the ads.

Ionized oxygen has been used medically for some time, but only recently has it entered the home, or indeed, the concert hall. A few groups, notably Mac Gayden's Skyboat, have been using ionized oxygen generators to cleanse and purify the atmosphere at their concerts, making the audience feel alert and attentive rather than listless and fatigued, which is presumably their normal state. No names, no pack-drill, but we can think of quite a few groups who could benefit. . .

And if this seems like yet another step on the road to the plug-in lifestyle and attendant horrors (subliminal frequency crowd control, disco, genocide, etc.) then before the pressure really drops perhaps a company called Bay Area Cryonics might offer you a way out (of sorts). For $15,000 plus a maintenance charge of $1,800 per year, they'll undertake to freeze your body and store it until such time as medical science has come to terms with the cause of your death, though maybe not the cause of your neuroses.

RIOT AS PUNKS KISS COPS

THE LONE STAR state's capital of the new cowboy country music — Austin, Texas — came alive with a little redneck agitation last month at a frenzied performance by local punks The Huns in a club near the University of Texas.

Mid-way through a number called "Eat Death Scum" singer Phil Tolstead paused to level some verbal abuse at a policeman who had just walked in, and then tried to plant a kiss on the officer as he stepped onto the stage.

The Huns played on while the cop handcuffed Tolstead, who was charged with inciting a riot after fighting erupted amongst the hundred-odd punks, the club's bouncers, two plainclothes cops and, finally, uniformed police.

And a few days earlier in Mississippi Doug Mays, leader of a group called Storm, was found guilty of inciting a riot and fined $300 after reportedly encouraging a crowd of 200 to "Kill the pigs" and to throw bottles at police cars. Mays, who won an award from a local college for the number of benefit gigs he plays, denied the charges.

"There's still some good ol' boys down here who don't like rock 'n' roll," he said.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THAT POSTER

REPRINTED on the left is the semi-notorious Clash poster that was given away with promotion copies of "Give 'Em Enough Rope". As the punters don't get it with their copies, we thought you'd like a look.

It illustrates roughly the theme of "Guns On The Roof"; a world at the mercy of irresponsible, despotic leaders and mad gunmen. The photo for Sweden, for example, represents the supposedly high Swedish suicide rate.

Oh well, expounding suspect ideologies with fancy graphics didn't do Devo any harm in the long run either.

THRILLS

OK, GUV — IT'S A FAIR COPELAND

THIS BAND has had a really tough time from the press. We've been accused of 'bandwagon punk' and now 'bandwagon reggae'. I hate that. 10cc are doing exactly the same thing. It's fine for them, but for us...

Andy Summers, who has held down the guitar spot for both Kevin Coyne and Kevin Ayers, isn't finding life easy with The Police.

Yet for my money "Can't Stand Losing You" and its predecessor "Roxanne" are two of 1978's hottest 45s, evincing a pitifully rare understanding of reggae from a white band.

Not that The Police are ripping off reggae. They're simply using it as a jumping off point, and they do it with a deal more conviction than 10cc. It's not saying a lot, I know, but The Police feel it.

Add to that bassist Sting's dynamic upper-register vocal, the combo's crisp playing and raw production, and you've got waxings to brighten up the duller charts.

But because The Police aren't in their teens (who is?) or earliest 20s, and dare to dye their hair blond a la Billy Idol, they're frowned upon. The fact that Stewart Copeland used to pick up the sticks for Curve Air doesn't help either...

"We are totally unfashionable," complains the American-born Copeland, the guy whose Klark Kent alias was blown in a recent Thrills piece. He still denies our identification.

As for jumping any 'punk bandwagon', Stewart explains: "I couldn't believe it. Suddenly my favourite kind of music was in fashion. Loud rock and roll with heavy guitar. None of us really identified with the previous culture all that much."

"I was always down on vegetarianism. It was great having all these kids screaming abuse at the people I'd been working with. People whose attitudes in the studio drove me crazy. I really enjoyed the 'fuck you'."

"We were actually one of the first new wave groups," claims Sting (real name Gordon Sumner). Copeland first saw Sting playing with a Newcastle jazz band at the end of '76, and was impressed. At the time Sting was teaching football and music in a Tyne-side infants school, but at Copeland's invitation he came to London. One Henri Padovani, now resident in The Electric Chairs, completed The Police's line-up.

Copeland has it that Padovani turned The Police into a punk act, something their hearts weren't into. He was subsequently replaced by Summers — in Copeland's words, "a real guitarist".

Originally The Police recorded for Illegal Records (one of several independent labels run by Copeland's brother Miles). Their one single, "Fall Out", bombed out.

Meanwhile The Police coped financially by working in Germany as part of a laser extravaganza, and taking on various other 'projects'. One of these was to do a Wrigley's chewing gum TV commercial. It didn't see the light of day, so we'll never know whether they're telling the truth when The Police say that this is why they dyed their hair.

Summers' working friendship with German opera conductor-turned-synthesizer fetishist Eberhard Schoener had brought about The Police's involvement with the laser show. In it they're featured as individual musicians, and not under the collective identity of The Police.

They plan to return to work with Schoener in the near future. Then they'll tour all of Europe and not, as has been the case in the past, just Germany. Schoener has also composed an opera in which he wants Sting to sing.

In fact Sting is very much in demand generally. His heart-throb looks have won him roles in various TV commercials, as well as parts in the Pistols' Great Rock 'n' Roll Swindle movie and The Who's Quadrophenia. In the Pistols' film he rapes Paul Cook in the back of a Chevrolet.

His part in Quadrophenia is more enviable. In it he plays Ace, Brighton's kingpin Mod, much admired by Jimmy, the film's central character. "Jimmy looks upon Ace as the pinnacle of Mod culture," explains Sting. "At the end of the film Jimmy sees him as a bellboy and commits suicide."

Still, the part in Quadrophenia has nothing on a role he played in a Dutch TV commercial where he had to rape Joanna Lumley. Advertising is a fairly lucrative sideline: the going rate is £150 for a day's work and you get a repeat fee every time the film is shown.

Sting is The Police's biggest reggae fan. "I think the rhythmic frontiers of pop are now being created in Jamaica, and I'm obsessed with those particular rhythms," he enthuses.

"Both our singles are reggae influenced, but that was by the way. They were our best songs at the time. They're not reggae all the way through. Both of them go into straight rock and roll."

"You can't expect us to play old Led Zeppelin riffs now."

The Police's first album, "Outlandos D'Amour" is now out. "Ello 'ello 'ello, what's all this then? Move along please. Etc. etc. and fade."

The case against Case

A depreciation by an arcane bongo-player

WHAM! BAM! Three bullets slammed into my vest. But first, let me tell you a little about British jazz."

With these words NME's jazz correspondent Brian Case opened his NME career, oh-so-many years ago.

"Er... Neil... can I come in, man? ... er... well, it's like this... fact is, man, I've been offered another job... no, not on Snow's man, what d'you take me for... Jesus, this is difficult... it's on... hardly dare say this man but like the bread's cool and the trip's hip and the pooch is lookin' to Daddy-o — that's me, man for a new collar. Six G's a week and a case of Grant's Stand Fast thrown in. Can't say no, can I man?"

With these words NME's jazz correspondent Brian Case closed his NME career, this week.

It was cool. Like, we've always known that Brian's heart was bigger than his frail body. The tears coursed down his furrowed cheeks, the little specks of crud awash like so many barrels going over Niagara, as he brokeleely tried to justify his decision. Us, we lit another Pall Mall and tried to comfort him, remembering all the while that throughout the years this man — a man, readers, whose prose was as tight as the drawstrings on his sack of Bull Durham and as dense as... never mind — has given sterling service to the obscure causes he favours. He has never let us down etcetera. Great writer and so forth. Black-hearted renegade, mind you.

We gave him warmth when he was cold.
Now he sells his ass for foreign gold. (Byron)

HEALTH WARNING:

Album covers smack of gratuitous violence

THE FIGHT against gratuitous images of sex and violence on album covers, spearheaded by the Women Against Violence Against Women movement and stemming from the Stones' "Black And Blue" ads depicting a girl strung up and beaten, continues to gain momentum in America.

The trade magazine Billboard recently surveyed leading record company art directors on the subject. Most of them felt the general trend was towards LP graphics which feature either photos of the band or general illustration. Sex and violence, they claim, is minimal.

Julia London, national coordinator of WAVAW, disagrees: "It blows me away to hear record companies claim that sex and violence are going out. If anything, violence in album graphics is becoming more of a problem."

"We have found that the greatest offenders are Warner Brothers and CBS. Elektra never stooped to this kind of thing until its Queen project," she added, referring to the nude bicycle race the new Queen album is based around.

A WAVAW newsletter recently listed "record albums promoted with abusive graphics" and named the top offenders as CBS, followed by Atlantic, Capitol, Warner Brothers, Mercury, ABC, RCA and A&M respectively.

Billboard's interviews with the art directors elicited some interesting comments. CBS was represented by John Berg, veteran director of packaging, art and design, who claimed: "We avoid sex and violence at CBS. It doesn't sell. We're into journalism, which is our attempt at informing the consumer."

This was contradicted by a CBS insider, who claimed: "There are no longer any rules. Everything goes in LP graphics. At CBS we try to tone it down as much as possible but while most companies won't admit it, it's practised at almost all, with the exception maybe of RSO."

Every label surveyed confirmed that major acts have final approval of sleeves, as do minor artists who want to become involved in that part of the record producing process. It appears that, as in the aforementioned Stones case, the companies are caught in the middle between the artist and the pressure groups.

For the record, the art directors confirmed that liner notes on sleeves are unlikely to make a come-back, and that the days of the elaborate gatefold sleeve are firmly in the past.

BLACKMAIL CORNER

Ah, the random magic of the Brownie 127 . . . Long, long ago, punters, before the world turned sour and the ray-dee-oh discovered Tony Blackburn and (filinch) Peter Powell, and even before the onset of galloping myopia, the young Declan McManus (that's Elvis Costello to you) was wont to party. And how he partied! (Don't be fooled by those drinking straws.) Elvis, by the way, is the beady-eyed brat south-west of the balloons in the centre of the shot.

Observe the tie, knotted just so. Notice the shirtings. Take a good look at the cake, and the gingham tablecloth. Yes, it's all horribly true. And in case you feel like doubting this, our informant (to whom the thanks of a grateful community) is also seated at this very same hideous feast, and vouches for its authenticity.

Penseur in Patchy Light is either a 3-time loser looking for a way out, OR . . .

THOSE hip to the trip will be merrily ripping to the dripping and slipping of a sticky single recently released on Virgin Records — Flying Lizards' hazardous, irreverent "Summertime Blues", the Cochran period piece lovelessly turned inside out, dumbly dissected and made for a smile and a new dance. It's a great party disc and would make a fine stocking filler, the missing link between The Smurfs and Devo.

The mainman responsible for this seven inch chuckle is the naughty, affectionate, some say loony, musical exhibitionist David Cunningham. The single was rashly recorded two years ago and inevitably rejected by record company stiffs. Virgin have picked up on it, interested in its now fashionable and marketable eccentricity, and it's selling well and being played in discos.

OUT to Brixton to talk with David Cunningham in a storeroom in a small factory, used as an office/workshop by Cunningham, cluttered with books, manuals, tapes, records, tape machines, cassettes, a violin, magazines, mugs, a bicycle. There are pictures and cuttings on the walls, anything from a photograph of Gavin Bryars (whose work on Obscure you may know) to Roy Carr's article on Andrew Lauder (Radar boss and next year's thing). Framed by the doorway, the soft, pink Cunningham is sat typing. He notices me, we fumble introductions.

I inform Cunningham that I am there as a follower of his activity, which incorporates The Flying Lizards, but is certainly not dominated by it. Flying Lizards is the silly spot in Cunningham's plan, although plan is too strong a word. More, his 'randomness', his 'curiosity'. Cunningham is a busy person, almost obsessively so. Apart from The Flying Lizards (his toy, though he was accompanied by friends Michael and Deborah Upton) he is also manager of progressive seminars This Heat, experimental composer and member of the London Music Collective, wit, writer, producer, musician, listener, enthusiast and artist. He also has his own label, Piano Recordings.

He's nothing if not enterprising, and very matter of fact about it. He is a part, or a focus, in an overall pattern that is emerging in modern rock, somehow a furtive link between the imploring Frer music scene, the exploding free rock scene and the functions and messages of disco. In short, he's an example of ambition, curiosity, speculation and peculiar naivety, like rock's Mark Perry, Vic Godard, Mark Smith and free music's David Toop, Paul Burwell, and Steve Beresford. (And disco's Giorgio Moroder).

Cunningham meditates his next move.

... An entrepreneurial polymath looking for a way in.

Let PAUL MORLEY tell you which.

The Flying Lizards is but a small part of all this, a quarter glance at the possibilities of repetition and sound, a giggle a fragment. It is the one Cunningham activity that you are familiar with. Cunningham has never gone out of his way to attract your attention. Not that he's a snob or an elitist, just that he's steady, and realises that his particular musical fascination is not something that you thrust onto people. And couldn't. This is unfortunate.

WE go to a cafe and we enthuse about Tony Frie's (ex Fall) and Dick Wain's extraordinary Inio The Passage. Cunningham tells me how he met up with This Heat, a fascinating, furious trio, drawn to their sound and attitude. He now finds himself heavily involved. "They're very strange. I can see them being a rock group on such a level as King Crimson, or I can see them being totally obscure." This Heat album should be released in the new year. "On Virgin E.M.I., even own label." There is a vague hint of desperation. Cunningham pays for the snack, and asks for a receipt — the advantages of a record company contract, however small.

Back in his workshop, he tells me that in his youth hearing Terry Riley intrigued him. "Just the sound, a very sensuous sound. And the idea of repetition. I've always like repetition. I think it's great and no one seems to use repetition very much — except, it's a very curious mixture. It's either very intellectual people or it's disco people who use it."

But Riley was just a vague impetus, not a momentous mark in time. Nothing really developed from there, it's just something Cunningham remembers hearing early on. "It didn't appear to have much in common with what I was doing at the time. I was really just messing about with music, mostly doing paintings and drawings. I wanted to be a graphic designer, really, so I could produce something visually stunning without knowing anything about drawing. But gradually I worked myself into a situation where I couldn't see any way to work in the visual arts, but I could see there was organisational systems becoming very important in music, especially electronics."

Cunningham dabbled: tapes, loops, noises. "I didn't know there were any experimental musicians in Britain for a long time. The first I came across must have been Cornelius Cardew. He taught at the college that I was at. His 'Paragraph' pieces are great pieces of experimental music. And then Steve Beresford. I was very impressed by him. He's like an obscure Rick Wakeman. He's very, very naturally talented."

Why was he so impressed by Beresford? "Because he was weird." And funny?

"It was weird and it was funny and it was a very nice sound."

Cunningham's musical interest was not confined to apparent 'stock weirdness'. He listened to pop. "Oh yes." As a main interest? "I didn't really have a main interest. I was always looking for one. If you'd have asked me who I liked in rock I would have said King Crimson, and people like Wyatt, people on the fringes of rock. I loved Phil Spector and Joe Meek, that whole approach. And The Beach Boys."

"Really I'm talking about how I found out about things, history, which isn't really interesting."

But your curiosity is interesting, that you become interested in what you did — which is a very obscure but satisfying and provocative sort of music. Most people just don't take the leaps.

"Yeah, but should they take the leaps, if they're happy listening to what they listen to? It's just that I've never been happy with what I listen to."

A reason that he has become so involved and active. Also, his definition of experimental music is similar to Michael Nyman's in his Experimental Music book, that the music should expand, take on a bit more than what the composer has written in; a composer should write variables in. It's like a composer denying himself control but in a very controlled way. Cunningham also admits to being quite hard to bore.

That seems to be an advantage playing/listening to experimental music, which can often be superficially repetitive and inactive.

"I don't think that anyone who bores easily would be interested in experimental music. I went through a period where I refused to be bored by anything. I would sit through anything. I refused to admit to boredom because I thought that was copping out. I have now modified my opinion."

Eventually, finding potential in the music of others, he made an album, the moderately successful exercise in accumulative errors "Grey Scale" (Piano Recordings). Unhurried, repetitive, soft, it is easily grouped with LaMonte Young, Reich, Glass, Riley. "I was very aware of the disciplines of the genre of experimental music when I made

"Grey Scale." If you listen, some of it sounds like Philip Glass, some is like a version of Riley's "In C" with a bass line put in. There were some representations of some Glass and Riley groups because I was attracted to the sound of those records, more so than people who just do things on piano. I like the thought of exotic percussion instruments and throbbing bass lines. I don't think "Grey Scale" works well on an emotive level, it's very much background music."

Cunningham recorded "Grey Scale" at the same time as "Summertime Blues", two years ago. They represent the hard and the soft, the flippant and the determined ends of his sounds. "Summertime Blues" has sold more in a day than "Grey Scale" has sold at all. "It's being played in discos" he excitedly reveals. "I thought people might use it for a dancing competition. Like, are you able to dance to this? And everyone would get into it until it came to the missed beat, and then everyone would fall over. The only person left standing would win the prize. That's the vision I had. Maybe it happens, because I don't dare go in those places."

But he remains fascinated by discos and disco music.

"There are basically lots of new ways of listening to and using music, which is very important. Disco is an important change in the way people use music. And play it. After Elvis Presley people made records rather than recording performances and the disco people are reacting against that way of doing things. I think."

Making disco records gives whole new access to sounds, and sound effects.

"It does in a way. You can get away with a lot more. But that's always been the case with something that has a steady beat. You can do practically anything, a la Velvet Underground."

The more regular the music is the more you can get away with. It's the ear training itself to the beat. It's the difference between Jimi Hendrix and Derek Bailey. Hendrix had the 4/4 rhythm behind him which gave it all a mental focus, whilst Derek is doing it on his own, and it is at its most disconcerting there. And probably at its least attractive as well.

He is interested in everything from Jimi Hendrix to Derek Bailey. Velvets to The Village People. Terry Riley to The Pop Group. Phil Spector to Steve Beresford. But, like me, he is repelled by the perverse construction of the Stockhausen variables. Not interested in that at all full stop. "I just see it as a total abstraction of anything to do with individual spirit. It's very defeatist. It's trying to shock. It's trying to do lots of things and it's doing them in an expensive and ineffectual way. It's not even interesting to listen to. I could possibly tolerate its insensitivities if it wasn't so nauseating to listen to."

It gives experimental music a bad name. The Stockhausen shadow hangs heavy and people think oh yeah burp squeal, whereas experimental music is predominately beautiful, listenable, approachable, all those sort of things. "It's the problems of being categorised into being avant garde. That's why Obscure is so good, because somehow they avoid being avant garde. It's probably better being a pop musician: pet, a hobby, than being an avant garde musician."

Cunningham has remained off the dole since leaving college, in a way as a self discipline — taking jobs (in a restaurant, scrapyard, etc) almost to find out what experiences could be learnt from such environments. He admits to being a doodler more than a communicator.

"There's no point in my trying to communicate on some levels, because I've got nothing to say to a lot of people. I really don't think a lot about what I am doing."

He's not sure about a follow up Flying Lizards single. A joke is a joke never worth repeating. There may be an album, whether Virgin put it out or not, which would put all his ideas into the pop idiom, serious and silly. He would love to be popular, but realistically doubts that he ever will be.

There is no way to categorise Cunningham. Unlikely looking, faintly absent minded, making music, being involved, is his function, his trap, like being a garage hand or something, any attention he gets is almost superfluous.

Right now, he gets his picture in the papers. And smiles a lot.

Single Of The Week

VILLAGE PEOPLE YMCA/The Women (Phonogram)

Balls! The thesaurus is obsolete! Tell 'em straight! Village People's straight! 45 "Macho Man" was excellent enough (ask anyone from Clarence Clemons to my mate Wardy), but "YMCA" leaves that choking in its slipstream. Disco, born in the main through the gay clubs, is best celebrated by women and gay males (Sylvester, Juvet).

"It's fun to stay at the YMCA/They got everything for young men to enjoy/You can hang out with all the boys/At the YMCA..."

"Y'see, no twilight guessing games with these chaps — but any jokey sneers and there's enough of them to get leery in return. I have no idea who the lead singer is but he bawls in terms reminiscent in strength and feel of the great Levi Stubbs himself. Village People are neither repetitive funk nor sweet hat candy floss. Both sides of this cracker are a dragon's teeth mesh of power, confidence, humour and exhilarating, raw pleasure.

"I love the Women/Who know they are Women!" runs the magnificent chorus before shouting call and response of women in history like Stevie Wonder did for blacks on "Songs In The Key Of Life."

If you are one of those ergonomists who believe people pick disco records as singles of the week because of fashion, I suggest you buy this killer and put it on, whereupon you and your friends can touch fingers and try to contact the living.

And the twelve inch just keeps on coming

MELBA MOORE: You Stepped Into My Life (Epic)
Though only released here in a shortened version, the eight minute import is available though it's 30 bob steeper. This is a grand record heaped in great sound, percussion and a razor blade of a handclap section. Melba (and anybody who doesn't remember "This Is It" is a twerp) constantly rearranges the melody line when she finally appears after three or four minutes of essential build up. The two percussion breaks are alert and pointed and the eight minutes fly by. From the vaults of some people called B.R.M. Gibb who, fantastically enough, have the same names as the people responsible for...

BEE GEES: Too Much Heaven (RSO)

Well, my old Wallamaloo exports, much as I have appreciated your recent plates this particular dish is wet enough for a frog to wear sandals on. It's in the mould of "How Deep Are Your Pockets", but with infinitely less warmth. I dare say this'll keep you in beer money and all that, but for the amount of times we're gonna have to hear it lilting up from the boutiques below I think we are entitled to a little more guts.

JOHN TRAVOLTA: Greased Lightning (Midasong)

Apparently lifted from a film called Grease this re-run of the Pepsi ad is too appalling for words once outside the mothership. Back inside the plastic bubble for you, m'lud.

ANDY GIBB: Why (RSO)

Completing the set of popular vibrators is Andy (Gift of the) Gibb.

"Everlasting Love" was a joy and this is too. Mid-paced and floating, he succeeds where the others miserably fail. Siouxsie will lose sleep over it but so will thousands of kids who won't care because they'll be in the nightclubs.

FASHION: Steady Eddie (Fashion)

Apart from its Hotrods rip-off sleeve, a great record indeed. Synthesized and crisp, it's slow and moody with just a dash of evil. Shouldn't count on global distribution, so scout the mail order section.

BIG IN JAPAN: EP (Zoo)

Another independent worthy of a basinful of anyone's airwaves. Actually it's mainly the great "Taxi" track that makes the whole thing value for money, particularly Jayne's (just Jayne) vocals and the climax after five minutes fading out on a drum sound as full as a bull's bum. Big in Bermondsey.

THE RECORDS: Starry Eyes (The Record Company)

THE PLEASERS: A Girl I Know (Arista)

Two pop records. The Records, who did a magnificent job backing Rachael Sweet, sweep along a tune too winsome by half to be really substantial, and while every record has a right to be bad The Pleasers are just taking liberties — abandoning their not totally unpalatable parodies of "Please Please Me" for surrogate acoustic "Till There Was You" babblings.

NICK LOWE: American Squirm/Peace Love And Understanding (Radar)

DAVE EDMUNDS: Television/Never Been In Love (Swansong)

Nick Lowe in strummerlongaMarie Provost mood has an uninspired time with "American Squirm", while its reverse — the old Brinsley bomb — has Nicholas running to the back of the stage, rummaging around in his prop suitcase, donning the bins before turning to receive audience applause for being Elvis Costello. (The Barron Knights too have a record out this week). Dave

Edmunds seems to have everything arse about face. The very fine and seriously singable "Never Been In Love" is buried behind the OK but passable (in a Mastermind sense) "Television". But if you haven't the "Tracks On Wax" LP, a rare bargain

AC/DC: Whole Lotta Rosie (Atlantic)

This single is obvious and boring and AC/DC's lead singer quite clearly had a depth charge lobbed into the font when he was being christened.

LAKESIDE: All The Way Live (Solar 12" Import)

RAHNI HARRIS: Six Million Steps (Inspiration)

BROADWAY: Kiss You All Over (Hilltak 12" Import)

MACHO: I'm A Man (EMI)

PLATINUM HOOK: Got To Find A Woman (Mowtown)

The first three are all expensive imports that, as a public service, I can advise you to avoid. Lakeside open with a drum riff identical to the beginning of Paul Simon's "50 Ways To Leave Your Lover" and then bleat bleat bleat for nine minutes about nothing. Junk funk with the nails in the coffin supplied by lyrics about 'parrrrrrtying'.

Rahni Harris takes time off from Chelsea FC to lay down (good choice of words I think) a relative of the saccharine "Love's Theme". It's a lacklustre outing that might learn how to record handclaps from "Instant Replay" or "I Am The Fly" — but ideal wallpaper for cosy dinner parties of which this sweet strain could melt her glares as you proffer the dripping. (In wee letters on the sleeve it says that "Six Million Steps" is released to help gather funds for muscular dystrophy in conjunction with some bloke who's running from Maine to Florida to help the cause).

I thought "Kiss You All Over" was rotten enough first time round but Broadway feel it deserves a ten minute disco riff to fully blossom. In fact, parts of this sound like the music that plays when contestants are trying to piece together large pieces of jigsaw into the face of a well-known personality.

Domestically, Macho disco up Chicago's "I'm A Man" into a dirge delivered in funky Euro dialect. In Spain next season this one'll clear a dance floor like nobody's business and will in fact (he said, limbering up a fine punch line) put all your Basques in one exit.

Platinum Hook sound like Ray Conniff singing Earth Wind and Fire.

THE CLASH: Tommy Gun (CBS)

After the brouhaha with "Remote Control" has the position been lax for this album cut to attack the singles market? For long-time followers of Clash this track has been around since early this year, and isn't made any more attractive by a shabby rendering of the ancient "1. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10. 11. 12. 13. STEVE HAYNES BAND: Save Me (Black Bear)

An accusation often levelled at reviewers is the amount of importance shown toward record sleeves. Well here we have what appear to be four close-to-30 men in blazers, leather jackets and Zeppelin T-shirts on the front, and on the back a girl in her underwear tied hand and foot with belts sitting in the half light with a menacing shadow looming up. She is looking frightened. On this nasty photo are the words "strong good loving". The actual record is Ace-type pub rock, as if it mattered.

CHILD: Still The One (Ariola Hansa)

The outrageously lame Child all stand looking as moody as their manager commands. Why the long faces chaps? Heavy dentures? BLUE OYSTER CULT: We Gotta Get Outta This Place (CBS)
Where Santana meet Leslie West in a live recording (the title originates from the audience interference).

VICTIM: Strange Thing By Night (Good Vibrations)
REDUCERS: Limited Edition (Good Vibrations)
OUTCASTS: Another Teenage Rebel (Good Vibrations)

Good Vibrations, obviously encouraged by the superb "Teenage Kicks" success, lob out two to bounce around in The Outcasts and Victim. While they must be frenzy to local ears back in Ireland, we Brits (touchy word that) are too spoiled to recommend more quick riff punk.

The Outcasts are the weaker (the B side, "Love Is For Sops," would've been lousy in any era) and Victim have the advantage of a great title to boost them — yet sadly neither rise above sub-average. (Ref. Cortinas/Early Saints).

Across on Vibes Records. The Reducers have a great sound down — all top and plastic bass, and the drummer deserves special attention. From Bury, but recorded in Manchester, the title to train the beady eye for is "Things Go Wrong"/"We Are Normal". Sharpened rock with neat echo touches. Write it down.

VILLAGE PEOPLE: San Francisco/Macho Man (DJM)
Well waddy know! They brought it back (NME readers don't all over black...) Full marks DJM for giving MM twelves this time, but why tuck it away behind the fine but inferior "San Francisco"? "By Popular Demand!" trumpets the cover, and by gosh the British have rare spunk (five pounds a copy).

M: Moderne Men (MCA)
I reviewed this when it was a French import and it was a piece of lame futuristic whiskered nonsense. Since then the mix has acquired Disco and turns in a fine rollicking performance. "Low" meets "Once Upon A Time" and produces a teararse tot. Dig deep for good singles — this thing is worth it.

THE CORTINAS: Heartache (CBS)
Ex-Step Forward "Fascist Dictators" stumble and bumble through a would-be love song. Lead singer J. 'Dickey' Valentine has a rough time. Hardly, hardly.

Free The Judas One! Section.
BONEY M: Mary's Boy Child (Atlantic)

SMURFS: Christmas In Smurfland (Decca)

CHORALE: Riu Riu (Arista)
Boney M revert to form shock! They reggae their way a la "Babylon" through the crusty old hymn and it's a horrifying experience, believe me. Of course if they'd had any sense they would've recorded something along the lines of "Olive Boy On The Cross. Tra Lala Lala!" in the fashion of their recent waxing, but I dare say someone would lodge a three-piece suit and 'ting.

I think The Smurfs are far more lovable and I don't dislike their singles at all.

But now it's prediction time! Atrocious Guys And Dolls lookalikes Chorale are going to waltz off with the Xmas spot with their moody monk chant "Riu Riu". Don't forget where you heard it first (cos you'll try).

FRANKIE AVALON: Beauty School Drop Out (De Lite)

Oh come on, enough is enough! Another single from the Grease soundtrack and Frankie Avalon (83) has his stab at reincarnation as he adopts the guise of a manager of a branch of Lord John. Frankie, me old browner, save the wails.

SYLVESTER: Dance (Disco Heat) (Fantasy)

A former single of the week, chopped dried and packaged as a seven-inch probably for some sales drive or other. Editing this masterwork is fatal. Does the Great Wall of China deserve to be reduced to crazy paving? I should say not! Come now, Fantasy (EMI), it's seven minutes and not a kopek less. The ideal

STATUS QUO: Accident Prone (Phonogram)

I refuse to buy any SQ albums but a collection of Greatest Hits would force me to fork out the ackers. On the condition that this crystal rhythm is present, of course. It's a sort of departure for Quo (collectively 412 years young), tuneful and with less accent on rifting. Enjoy, enjoy — pure Anglo Saxon with just a dash of Viking.

SMIRKS: Rosemary (Beserkley)

I get a feeling that this is playing too fast and an impression that they are releasing weak material hoping to get by with an off-beat reputation. I mean, 'taint that bad but I believe every recording studio should have a huge sign permanently on display. It should read: You are asking people to pay 90 pence so watch it!

SOUTHSIDE JOHNNY AND THE ASHBURY JUKES: I Played The Fool (Epic)

SJ has his heart in the right place, and he and the boys don't need a big sign in their studio. A strong blowy brass construction. Swing high, New Jersey, the world owes ya.

TODD RUNDGREN: All the Children Sing (Bearsville)

Todd still has worth and part of it shows on a pleasant (but remember that sign!) and lightweight double-tracked, looped, disc of some crispness. The man has charisma (every December 25th).

ANYTIME...

MEET SCRITTI Politti: three or four young musicians (one is a floating member), and equally important, a large circle of close friends who provide help, disruption, money for drinks, encouragement and criticism.

The friends are part of an important balance. Just think of other bands who've become steadily more self-absorbed, aggressively so sometimes, losing all perspective. You can't blame those bands: the 'new wave' was, is, or ought to have been about, if anything, a better access to and understanding of the ways and means of our jolly recording industry. But instead of them using it, it has used them.

Scritti Politti have decided to approach the problems and potential of useful action with and in rock music in a discursive, critical, certain manner.

One tangible result is a self-financed three-track EP. On the sleeve (self photographed, developed and designed) is a breakdown of every financial expenditure incurred in the recording, manufacture, packaging, and distribution of the record.

The Desperate Bicycles are another 'rock' group who have made this particular form of helpful, provocative information available, and Scritti Politti acknowledge, and were indeed encouraged by The Desperate Bicycles.

"Why can't Western rock bands work like jazz musicians — sharing equipment and ideas, helping each other at just that basic level of co-operation. We certainly got that from the Bikes, and from people at Rough Trade. If we'd moved straight into 'The Biz', we'd almost certainly have become a very insular band, seeing ourselves as The New Thing, trying to compete with other bands. That sort of idea would have been foisted onto us, by a manager."

"If any information comes out of this article and makes it a little more clear why we had to conduct it as we have, that's the realisation of the bankruptcy of a formalist approach."

REFLECTIONS ON IN(TER)DEPENDENCE

"You'd better explain what you mean by that..."

"What I mean by a 'formalist' approach are the ways of going on and the meanings of different ways of going on and statements you make, which are sorted and are understood and have meaning only by reference back to earlier developments in the same sectional, phenomenal history.

"It's a bit like the way a lot of modern art works. Its meaning is because it acts, purportedly, critically back on earlier modern art. But, I mean, that's bankrupt... all the formal limitations of the traditional idea of how to make art run out, formally expired.

"And I think the same thing has definitely happened in music. But rock 'n' roll is a different business because a lot of people like to pretend that rock 'n' roll never changes, and that the conditions that inform it are a lot more attuned to everyday life and everyday needs such that it cannot expire formally; but if that were so than I don't think we'd be hearing Bo Diddley riffs on the new Clash LP, 18 years after Bo Diddley played them.

ATTRACTIVE though their images may be, most of our popular, populist rock units — Robinson, Clash, Banshees, etc — have proved to be less about new ideas, new perceptions, and new approaches, then about pure and seductive Marketing.

All that's necessary for a viable alternative is a synthesis of information, considered commitment, and an aesthetic stimulation — and a real 'complete control'.

Control over interviews, for instance, as opposed to walking blindly with no idea of what is to be communicated. Artists and the press are drawn together and drawn apart by excesses of either out-of-hand emotion or reserved, unbudging function (it's just a job, man).

People's expectations are lovelessly manipulated in the press — without any understanding of just exactly what we'll all supposed to expect from new rock bands, and what they expect from their potential audience.

Above all, any new band trying and testing things outside all the usual, used structures, images, reasons, and reactions, deserves not to be massively 'built up' — whether through misplaced enthusiasm or muddled hype.

SP: "We don't want to go into any tedious attempt at grand plans and strategies. Our way of going through the Rock Biz is very much bit by bit. It's of no use to anyone if the same old char, the same old justification are trotted out."

"The rock press really fails to take any account of their own position."

An eager and not over-educated Scritti Politti. Three or four young musicians from various parts of the country, now centred in London, living in a squat (no great shakes, they say).

They don't need to be spoiled by any squashed image of each or all of them. They're actively concerned with establishing some way of working with rather than through the press, the companies, the promoters. A public language rather than image.

SP: "We don't think there's a great deal of use in personal biographies."

MEET THE KILLER

Women, liquor, the devil and me — JERRY LEE tells CLIFF WHITE a torrid tale

"Today he's 40 years old, going on 20. Don't look for the grey in his hair 'cause he ain't got any. He's got a young thing beside him, that just melts in his hands. He's middle-age crazy, trying to prove he still can."

IN TRUTH he was 43 on September 29, his current lady was not beside him on his recent European tour, and other personal details in the rest of the song are not his. But in spirit, when on each night of the tour Jerry Lee Lewis restated in his own inimitable manner Sonny Throckmorton's ballad of a restless man fighting the inevitable, he was owning up. "Middle Age Crazy" indeed.

To be a 43-year-old inveterate rock 'n' roller is itself paradox enough for one man to try to come to terms with. To be a 43-year-old inveterate rock 'n' roller who believes that his music and lifestyle are sinful but who cannot change to save his soul is a mightier head-banger still. To suffer, on top of that, an equally ambivalent and self-torturing inner-conflict about women and marriage, along the traditional line of "you can't live with 'em and you can't live without 'em", adds up to a sufficiently heavy mental burden to tip the scales towards mixed-up confusion.

Crazy enough, even, to be Jerry Lee Lewis.

Theoretically, this was to be a difficult assignment. "Notoriously unpredictable", "You'll never get near him", "Probably won't talk to you", "You won't be able to understand half of what he says if you do get to meet him", all those trips were laid on me beforehand, not to mention the in-house saga of that indomitable duo, Mick Farris and Chalkie Davies, who trekked up north to corner Jerry last time he was in Britain, only to return to the office with little more than sore tempers, hangovers and fleeting impressions of their quarry as glimpsed around slamming doors.

Thanks to the intercession of friends who are somewhat closer to Jerry than he is to officialdom, this time I got lucky. And so it happened that I was escorted into dressing room no. 1 of the Winter Gardens, Margate, there to be warmly greeted by an elusive rock 'n' roll legend.

Naked to the waist except for a small towel slung around his shoulders, Jerry sat hunched on the edge of an easy chair in one corner of the room, nursing a half-finished bottle of lager.

He looks his age but carries it well. The once-familiar features that gradually faded out during the '60s have now tightened again and regrouped into a craggy variant of the Kirk Douglas mould, his hair is still all his own and the moderate glob of middle-age spread above his belt shows little evidence of 25 years of hard drinking (although Jerry quickly donned a shirt when photographer Rob Hall appeared).

From the outset The Killer was affable, though dispirited (as were we all in fog-shrouded, off-season Margate-by-the-sea), and once he'd sussed me out he relaxed completely, speaking honestly about himself and his hang-ups with barely a trace of the fiery proclamations of old.

"Stone cold sober? I don't believe in that..."

Despite his self-confessed love of booze he drank very little during the two or three hours I was with him (just the rest of the bottle of beer and a couple of slugs of Seagrams whiskey) and he didn't smoke at all.

Nevertheless, his rich southern drawl was hoarse and slurred enough to make him sound like a chain-smoking dipper; a result, I'd guess, of fatigue and prescribed medication. Jerry doesn't like to sleep these days — not on his own, anyway — nor does he seem to eat a lot. When I met him he'd been without much rest or sustenance for five days straight.

WITHOUT GETTING into a lot of phonetical gibberish and theatrical asides it's impossible to relate our conversation accurately. As well as the bayou brogue, he speaks like he sings in a shifting, often contradictory flow of emotions that aren't apparent in the coldly printed word... (pause)... and his timing is immaculate.

For instance, Jerry spoke with genuine sorrow about the break-up of his marriage to Myra — the marriage which offended puritan society and badly disrupted his career (Myra is his 2nd or 3rd cousin and was only 13 or 14 when they married) but which confounded gossip by lasting nearly 15 years. The marriage ended after many ups and downs when Myra caught Jerry bang-to-rights with an Indian girlfriend.

"I'm sorry I lost her," Jerry sighed, "but I just got caught." Mischievous chuckle. "That Indian girl, I just couldn't turn her down." Laughs, then realises what he's said. "Oh! Please don't print that. If Myra sees that I'll never get her back."

No, I won't print. I want to assure him.

"Oh, print it" — reckless again — "I don't care." But then uncertain. "No, wait a minute, let me think about it." Laughs to himself.

Don't worry, I begin again, I won't

Assertive now, mind made up.

"Cliff, you print what you want to print, I'm only joking. I'm telling you the truth though; I would never lie to you." Warns to the subject, almost as if admonishing me, or perhaps himself, for thinking otherwise. "I believe in being truthful... I don't believe in conning people... I don't believe in saying something that's not right. Tell it like it is. Be what you are, man. Don't give me no phoney person."

As you can see, it's a bugger to transcribe. Anyway, we'll do our best

FOLLOWING ON Lewis' train of thought, I ask him whether he has had any regrets in his life. "Regrets?" He pauses just long enough... "Yup, I can't find that Indian girl." Collapse of everyone in the room. Jerry laughs right along with everyone else at the effect of his punch-line but wonders if he's said the wrong thing. Again.

"Nah," he finally assures himself. "Myra'd get a kick out o' that. She'd laugh right along." Pause. "But it is true."

Later in the day, when marriage once again cast its tangled net over the conversation, another convulsion of Lewisisms chased each other round his mind. Try this lot without stage directions.

"I have been married ever since I was 15 years old and now I'm gonna be a single man. I wonder how that's gonna be? Not very, very good, is it? I need a woman around, but I'd hate to have to live with one without marrying her. I love to say, 'I do'."

"I'm easily talked into it. Really. Every woman I've ever married asked me to marry them, I didn't ask them to marry me. Sumpin' wrong, somewhere.

"Boy, if me and Linda Ronstadt ever get together, we'll make it!"

"They done me dirty... and I've been an angel... in disguise. Nahh, that's not true. I don't regret any of my marriages... I don't think. Yeah I do! I wish I'd never got married in the first place. I should never have gotten married. Nahh, I should have. Nahh, I shouldn't have."

"If I had to do it over I'd do the same thing. I love it. They were good people... it just didn't work out. It's funny, ten years ago I come out with 'Another Place, Another Time', a tearjerker, y'know? Put me back in the charts... and doing a Shakespeare play at the same time. I had my wife, I was happy and I was doing good. What happened?"

ONE SMALL thing that happened was that Jerry got wed to the country charts, where he has been consistently successful for the last decade, despite rarely managing even a minor affair with the pop charts. So, apart from occasional appearances on American oldie-but-goodie shows and the odd sprit round Europe now and then, he has been out of the centre-ring spotlight for a good proportion of his career. In his own estimation that's as much due to lack of promotion as anything, so after 16 years with the Phonogram corp he has just recently signed with Elektra/Asylum, for whom he will record... what? That's the question.

Now remember, dear reader, the words may look staccato on the page but you gotta read 'em slow 'n' easy, raking in the measured drawl and turnabout moods.

So what then for the future?

"Rock 'n' roll, I believe. I don't classify myself as a country singer really and I never have. I'm just Jerry Lee Lewis, that's all. You could call 'You Win Again' country but it was a pop hit. 'Whole Lotta Shakin' Goin' On' was country and pop and rhythm 'n' blues hit. But whatever you call it, I'm no guitar rocker from Nashville. I'm a piano, rock 'n' roll, mutha humper from Memphis."

"I don't dig that country crap... hillbilly guitar pluckers, ya know? What is country music? Is it Roy Acuff? If it is, to hell with it. Is it Hank Williams? I like it. You can't classify Hank Williams as a country singer... he was too smart; his words, his pronunciation and the way he had it. Not like, say... well, I'm not gonna say 'cause I know all these people."

"Willie Nelson is fantastic but it took him 20 years to get a hit, gotta remember that. And Waylon Jennings... those two together, man, they're something else. But they're still just guitar players and singers. I always tell 'em that: it makes 'em mad. I play piano; it's got a lot more strings on it... a lot harder to tame."

On the other hand, they're writers as well. You've written very few songs in your time.

"I don't want to get into writing because I'm waned of it. It'll kill ya. Anybody that writes songs, like Hank Williams or Kris Kristofferson... Kris had to quit writing. If he hadn't he'd be dead. It killed Hank Williams."

"All your great writers... it takes something out of you. You get in different moods... I don't know, I

HELL

By CHRIS SALEWICZ

JUST ANOTHER BUNCH OF MIDDLE CLASS KIDS WITH SILLY NAMES AND SPIKY HAIRCUTS

"H E-E-EYY..." Pure Hell drummer Spider Blaze tousles his Rita Hayworth red crop and slaps his right palm down on mine, giving me one of those Yanqui jive street greetings to which I'm never quite sure how it's best to respond.

Ah, but I'd thought that androgynous face with its Hendrix clone nose and mouth looked familiar the second I set eyes on it, when bassist Lenny Steel showed me into the front room of the Chelsea town house where Pure Hell have holed up for their sojourn in London.

It'd been about Day Three of the Joseph Stevens Guide to Manhattan last April. Somewhere in between being shown the best methodo clinic in town and the restaurant where Joey Gallo got blown away, the sterling photog took me into the building that housed the New York branch of the US Passport office.

Suddenly there was a yell and a shout and this figure that I see before me now had come hurtling down an escalator like he was trying to escape after just wiping out the entire section.

All that had happened, though, was that Spider didn't have enough signatures on his passport application form. Would Joe help out?

Joe Stevens (Services And General Hospitality To The Punk Generation) sure would.

Which was good of him. If Joe hadn't done that, Spider might never have made it over to England to take part in the final attempt to resuscitate The Heartbreakers — the aim of his mission that day at the airport.

It was impossible, of course. After a month Spider upped and returned to the States.

"Johnny Thunders" ... urrh... personal habits ... were just totally out of hand. It was like we weren't even there," he shrugs.

Besides, no way was The Heartbreakers intended to be a permanent gig for Spider. He was just helping out a bunch of old lofi-mates.

Pure Hell was the real gig. It has been on and off for some five years now.

There'd been a few hold-ups, of course since the band's formation in 1972. Like the move from their home town of Philadelphia the hundred miles or so to New York City itself.

And then — even though Sylvain Sylvain assured them that they need use nothing more complicated than a four-track recorder to cut a demo on — they were so pigheaded insistent on the need to make a proper recording that they sold all their instruments to pay for the studio time. And then record companies wanted to come and watch them play gigs. Uh-uh...

How come we didn't think of that?

Then it was decided that the group was all arse-end backwards anyway. Okay, Spider'd stay on his drums and Chip Reck would remain on lead guitar, but it kinda seemed that if Stinker was gonna write all the material then he might be better off shifting up from bass-playing to actually interpreting the material on stage as vocalist. So Lenny Steel and he changed places. Except that naturality that all took a while or two.

AS SEEMS to be the case with the vast majority of US new wavers, Pure Hell's roots are certainly more middleclass black than ghetto. At least they're honest about it — the band freely admit that they grew up in the very best part of Philadelphia. Even so, says Stinker, de-immersing himself from a copy of Linda Goodman's Sun Signs. "People used to say we were like a black MCS even back in '72 when we just started."

The sound of Mayor Rizzo's city can be heard in Pure Hell's music, though, maintains Spider: "Instead of shooting people and throwing bottles at them and destroying people and property with violence we stuck the violence thing through our music."

The time Pure Hell first formed, of course, coincided with the initial strong breakthrough from the Philly Sound, whose sweet soul was surely the antithesis of the four-piece.

"Gamble and Huff wanted to change us around," sneers Spider. "And we could've made it that way. Bernie from Harold Melvin and the Blue Notes said they could help us out. But when they found out how free we were and that we weren't going to change, then ... they didn't really think they could help us at all."

"See," adds Chip, "people like Jimi Hendrix just turned my head around. You listen to The O'Jays and you don't hear no guitar. I just couldn't lay back with that music and not try and get my rocks off. Once I'd got into that rock guitar sound I couldn't look back. Just headed on towards this direction we got now. Besides, a lot of that music is just part of the surroundings."

"Sure," agrees Spider, "they're programmed alright. They don't want to get into punk or even rock 'n' roll because they're too scared. Believe you me, I go through hell when I'm in Philadelphia for looking like this."

Maybe there's a master plan at work, but one can't help thinking that for Spider, as with so many US punks, the trappings are of far greater importance than any, er, 'attitude'. His references to having made it into the Stones' entourage — he seems keener to emphasize the two months he spent staying with Mick Taylor in London in 1975 than that Charlie Watts (along with Jerry Nolan and Mitch Mitchell) is his biggest drumming influence and his constant reminders of Ricci Burns' having just coloured the whole band's hair and his obvious infatuation with a Kings Road way of existence suggest an almost Ritz vision of life.

But maybe, like so many US rockers, he's just an obsessive Angliophile who's got some of it a bit wrong.

Also, though their recent clothes-buying visit had made them the talk of Beaufort Market when I dropped in there the other afternoon, there is more to Pure Hell than simply cool posing and well-hung leathers. Led Zeppelin riffs, mainly, but still...

Their manager Curtis Knight (The Man Who Discovered Jimi Hendrix) obviously reckons he can score them a deal right here in the UK. Judging by the way the crowd went apeshit for Pure Hell at the Music Machine, I'd say he's just gone and picked another winner.

Nobody teaches better than Charlie Daniels...

Stop struggling with books and start playing properly.

TEACH YOURSELF ROCK GUITAR

BY ONE OF AMERICA'S GREATEST ROCK GUITARISTS — CHARLIE DANIELS

Don't just take our word for it —

"Charlie Daniels is one of the best guitarists in America and he certainly knows what he's talking about. It's well worth the money..." (Rory Gallagher, MELODY MAKER)

"Daniels offers many important tips and the record lacks fashion in a very interesting way. A very good way of learning..." (Steve Howe, lead guitarist with Yes, MELODY MAKER)

"This record is excellent. In my view it's much better than all the tuition books I have seen." RECORD MIRROR

"This album is a big step forward — it represents good value."

"The first album we have ever heard that actually gives sensible advice on playing. Excellent!" SOUNDS

"Charlie has made a great contribution to guitar playing by making this album."

Brian de Palma makes a point while counting his fingers.

Tom Sheehan

The fist and the fury

Brian de Palma talks to Monty Smith

Not many people care for Brian de Palma's latest film, The Fury. In fact, even he's not quite sure about it.

"I saw it for the first time in six months recently and I thought 'What is this?'"

A big man in a battered brown jacket, he sits back in the smart chair he's occupying in 20th century Fox's London office and laughs quietly to himself.

"I think I've done too many of these movies, as some critics have pointed out." He speaks softly through his beard, with the merest trace of a lip. "I'd be the first to agree."

A 37-year old film-maker from New York, de Palma has been touted as one of the New American Cinema's leading lights since he made a couple of establishment-bashing comedies starring Robert de Niro, back in the late '60s.

A decade on and — despite the qualitative success of Carrie — he has yet to tuck under his belt a blockbuster on the scale of his contemporaries: Coppola's Godfather, Scorsese's Taxi Driver, Spielberg's Jaws, Lucas' Star Wars. He doesn't seem bothered: "If a movie makes back its money, then that to me is successful. The important thing is to keep making movies."

Which he has done consistently and well, after his first encounter with Hollywood in 1970 resulted in a sad debacle called Get To Know Your Rabbit, a Tommy Smothers' comedy. Since then he's made two overtly Hitchcockian thrillers — Sisters (after Psycho) and Obsession (after Vertigo) — a ghoulish celebration of horror-rock (Phantom Of The Paradise) and a convincing essay in telekinetic terror (Carrie).

A diamond-hard quartet of films, all of them reveal their maker to be a stylistic baron, a man fully conversant with the capabilities of the camera and possessed of an impish hand in the cutting room. He spent his high school years designing computers, hence his felicity with cameras, and didn't become interested in movies until a teenager, hence his healthy preference for form over content. A stance, incidentally, which places him diametrically opposite all of those berks who persist in criticising films as though they were books.

"It's very distressing," he says, wearily adding that, yes, he is fed up with the Hitchcock companions. "I keep getting asked the same stupid questions that they've been asking Hitchcock for 30 years and all the answers are in the Truffaut book. I just refer them to the text. People were always telling him that there wasn't any content in his movies and he would reply: 'What is the content of a still life?'"

"I'm not too expressly interested in content. I'm concerned with coming up with cinematic conceptions for various sequences. That's what occupied me the last three or four films. Once I've gotten past that — which I think I have now — I can start using the grammar I've developed in other material."

Even so, The Fury is extremely disappointing. It stars Kirk Douglas in an unlikely tale of intrigue and derring-do, dragging in telekinesis (again) and secret agents. It's all deck as a brush and seems to exist solely as an excuse for the director to pull off a few spectacular set pieces — the best of which features John Cassavetes exploding to smithereens in slow motion ("Hell, it's just a dummy blowing up," says de Palma). And without placing too much emphasis on the content, it does have enough plot for seven different movies. "Yeah, I know," he concedes, smiling. "It's very complicated and it's difficult to engage the audience's identification with so many characters, it's true."

So is The Fury an experiment, or what?

"Well, I was trying to lick this very complicated story and I don't know how successful I was. It certainly works in that you watch it, but I don't know whether that's in fascination or not. It certainly goes by fast enough. But what is it, ultimately? People flying through windows," he laughs. "Cars being dumped into water."

"Some people think that Carrie was the best and I shouldn't have done this stuff, and maybe they're right. But I was interested in doing something of that size. I'd never done anything that big before and I learned a lot from it.

De Palma: "What is The Fury about? It's about people flying through windows."

"I don't think you can make any fine movies until you've developed as a director and it takes a long time to do that. It may take 20 years. Few people survive that because they don't make enough movies now."

"People like Ford, Hitchcock and Hawks made lots of movies, had a lot of chances to develop their craft. Nowadays, Steven (Spielberg) and George (Lucas) have made two or three movies, phenomenal successes but—" He shrugs. "George is just producing now, you know? So I try everything. I make lots of different kinds of movies."

Already, he's made a comedy since The Fury (a low-budget job with some film school pupils), and is now preparing to make Prince of the City (about narcotics cops) and an adaptation of Alfred Bestor's SF classic The Demolished Man.

Does he watch a lot of movies?

"Yes I do. And I think the most interesting movies are being made in America now. This is the decade of the American director. I'm not too interested in the French anymore. Some of the Australians and the Germans are quite good."

He asks if I've seen Wim Wenders' The American Friend. I tell him that, like most German films, I admire it in a cold, detached sort of way.

"You probably like Lassie pictures," he says, laughing. "I bet you were a sucker for Dumbo, right?"

One of my favourites. "Yeah — isn't that incredible, when the mother's holding on to the truck? Not a dry eye in the house. And when Bambi's mother gets it?"

Yes, but Bambi's got a duff second half.

"Yeah, it certainly does. But if you want heart in a movie, go see a Martin Scorsese film."

No thanks. Not after New York, New York.

"Oh, you put him in the dustbin so quickly. Think of his better days."

Which will happen again?

"Oh yes, I'm sure."

Oscar-winning director John G. Avildsen recently revealed why he walked away from Saturday Night Fever.

Avildsen said he didn't want John Travolta working in a paint store, didn't want the Puerto Rican scene and wanted the dance contest to take place in Manhattan. "I'm not saying more people would have gone," he said. "But I think it would have been a more dramatic film." And now Avildsen has dumped Rocky Part II, over script disagreements. Still, he does have three projects in the pipeline: Robin, a re-working of the Mr Hood legend.

Aldous Huxley's The Island and The Corporation, about abuse of big business.

And talking of Johnny Revolving, the Disco King's brother, Joey Travolta, has a few buns in the oven of his own. Not only has he made an album, he's doing a TV pilot for a series called Flatbush Fungo, a feature film called Sunnyside, and has just signed a deal with Paramount concerning his book Steel Away, based on his teaching experiences. So who needs scientology anyway...?

With their usual egotistical ignorance, American film critics have given Robert Altman's latest, A Wedding, a rough ride. We will soon be able to judge its merits for ourselves, since it opens over here shortly before Christmas. Meanwhile, lined up for Altman's next project, Health, are Lauren Bacall, Glenda Jackson and James Garner.

Well-preserved 38-year old Muppets star Raquel Welch currently considering a star role in Velvet Gloves, about women boxers in Las Vegas. Squelchy Welch is already signed opposite Anthony Quinn in Caracas, the real-life story of the Mexican narcotics king... Jean-Luc Godard, the leading light of the New Wave (the original one, you bozos, the French one in the '50s) is preparing his latest film, The Buggy Siegel Story. Godard has approached Robert De Niro to play the famous gangster and the film will be set in the Hollywood of the '40s.

After their success with The Stud (at the box-office, if nowhere else), and with it's sequel, The Bitch, on the way, Brent Walker continue their production schedule with Dracula Rocks, a horrible — er, sorry — a horror musical.

Can't wait for this one either: Bionic Lee Majors in Disco Mania.

For some reason, Warner Bros are planning two movies based on Patricia Bosworth's biography of Montgomery

Clift. One that dwells on Monty's Jason King-like activities, perhaps, and one that doesn't.

Part-time singer Keith Carradine — brother of the Kung Fu one — is cast as Edgar Allan Poe in an upcoming biopic on the deranged dope-addicted writer of macabre minor masterpieces.

Till now, hardly a prolific film-maker, Karel Reisz will be working on two films next year. His latest, Dog Soldiers, starring Nick Nolte in a tough story about smack smuggling from Viet Nam, opens in London next month and is his first film since The Gambler in 1974. His new projects include a comedy set in New York and an adaptation of John Fowles' The French Lieutenant's Women, to be scripted by Harold Pinter.

An item for sale at a recent Sotheby's auction in New York was listed as: "Crow hide trousers once tried on by Robert Redford." Not near the heat of his desert home, we trust.

Godfather of American movies Roger Corman is lining up soppy Happy Days star Ronny Howard for a Star Wars satire called Car Wars.

Probably even sillier will be The Kite Runner, a film about the psychic powers of plants in which one of our little green friends is eyewitness to a murder.

And Dr Michael Crichton — whose new film Coma will be reviewed in Silver Screen soonest — has been offered a million dollars to write the screenplay of his latest novel, Africa. One slight snag — he hasn't even written the book yet.

De Palma: "My God! Is that the time? Listen, I've got to fly."

Every second counts in the adventure of a lifetime.

Got Mah Ego Workin'

Pennie Smith

When the Buffalo of Immodesty stomps the tender talent-plant 'neath its cloven heel, the result, as Confucius noted, is "rampant megabullshit, and I don't mean maybe."

Self-love and guitar:
ROBERT JOHNSON
Treacherous smile:
MAX BELL

ROBERT JOHNSON, native of North Memphis, Tennessee, is a very self-satisfied "person".

At first it isn't difficult to understand the root of an assurance that seems to border on arrogance. He rose out of a predominantly poor working-class background, a black ghetto, and, like the white man in the Clash vignette, it was a case of prove yourself or get stomped on.

Always at the back of his mind lurks an image of Elvis Presley, his childhood and adulthood idol who made the grade in a similar neighbourhood, a few blocks down from the Johnson tenement. The Sun Records mythology is ingrained in his memory bank.

As I knocked on the door of his London hotel room I was prepared to admit that familiarity with his debut album "Close Personal Friend" and the excellent chartbound single "I'll Be Waiting For You" were testament to the gent's talents; but even if I had never heard of Robert Johnson he soon made it clear that he was privy to a genius so wondrous in design, and so bursting in "vitality" and "energy" that a contrary view would amount to sacrilege.

Yet the Johnson vinyl presence is hardly matched by the visual evidence; the real man fails to make the connection. The record suggests a braggadocio comparable with Tom Petty but the flesh and blood is a slight, bespectacled figure, short haired fifties cruiser flash, customised soda pop chic. As with all such specimens, the regimented emulation of an era as dead as its pensioned off heroes smacks of high camp, a twee nostalgia quite at odds with the current age.

Behind the gentle Southern twang, its syllables as thick as better half Eddie Wright's giggling physiognomy, one senses constant intimations of the Johnson immortality. That knack for the hook line and sinky melody is soon matched and overtaken by our subject's concerted appraisal of his abundant virtues — guitarist, pundit, clothes designer and shifter of round plastic things.

Johnson's reasons for keeping the ego on full inflation might make him good P.R. copy but like Carter's economically bankrupt administration they rub the third world English up the wrong way.

Taking it from the top (and events actually take a catastrophic dive hereafter), at 17 Johnson won the post of rhythm guitarist with Isaac Hayes during the Shaft megatomania's catapult to stardom via "Hot Buttered Soul": "I was the only white man for fifty miles, pretty amazing considering the young age and stuff."

Cue applause and massed genuflections.

Straight out of high school and whitey is swapping the bro's shuffle and shake with the Stax organisation. He became an accepted sessioneer, too, Hayes being lazy and rich enough only to work the weekends, leaving Johnson free to notch up credits with Anne Peebles, The Staple Singers, Willie Mitchell and Eddie Floyd.

"One of mah first gigs was at the Apollo Theatre; it was quite extraordinary, seein' all them black faces."

I wondered if the presence of an upstart honkey called for any adverse resentment from the Hayes' circus but I needn't have worried:

"Nope. See, I come from the same neighbourhood and I can act and talk just like them. I got a black man's feel, you can hear it on the record. That's why Isaac thought I was the greatest rhythm guitarist ever 'cos I had it all, everything the other guys had plus something a bit special."

He scratches his head briefly.

"More brains I guess. The guy who took mah place, Skip somethin' or other, man he was dumb. They lost him on the road, he was all strung out on drugs, went off with a bunch of junkies and they lost him. They found him agin' since though... heh... heh."

BETWEEN 1971 and 1973 Johnson put down his guitar and delivered furniture to Elvis's Graceland estate. He and Wright rebuilt fifties cars and presided over a procaic custom club, chopping and channelling the haroque shark-tailed Fords and Corvairs which rolled on the highway rust heaps. He also bought and sold guitars. Chris Spedding purchased an axe from the kid and, hearing of his prodigious talents, offered him a gig as bassist. The offer was declined but a link has been forged over the pond... with John Entwistle, then in the process of completing the Ox lineup to promote "Mad Dog".

"That was totally disorganised. First we had to persuade him to reduce Ox from a fifteen piece to a five piece band. Then the producer, John Alcock, asked me to erase the original guitarist and overdub my parts, which I did. The record came out with his name on, though. The conflict of interests was immense. By the time we got to America the album sounded stale, Entwistle had cash to blow, he was the financier and we were the bobby. The Who roadies were used to going mad, it got impossible."

Even then the perennially tedious "Who to continue or split" schtick was raising its crashingly dull question mark. Inevitably, Entwistle rejoined his cronies to finish off the legend once and for all.

Through a newly-acquired set of superstar English friends and business associates of Mick Jagger, Johnson now decided to audition for the equally somnambulant vacant Stone seat — this farce being acted out by Larry Coryell, Jeff Beck, Wayne Perkins and other luminaries: too redundant to mention. But Johnson turned up to find that his slot had been set aside for some other mug who couldn't even find the studio. Jagger had a flunkey let him in and immediately put the Yank at ease. (Assume pseudo cockney man of the street drawl: "Great to see ya mate but we're expectin' someone else to show and they ain't made it, knowarramean...")

Johnson set up next to Beck, Richards and M.J.P., filled in with some blues and cut one song that never materialised on album, took his cheque and went home to Memphis. "I was not waiting by the phone. The Stones obviously wanted an English guy, it was like a jam picnic. I wish they'd tried to see who could boogie the best on 'Jumpin' Jack Flash'."

On return Johnson joined Country Funk, later Ardent house band Hot Dogs, contemporaries of Alex Chilton's Big Star, before opting again for the lucrative black sessions which gave him room to display his self-styled "legendary right hand". It is this rhythm attack which sets him apart from the common herd.

"On the album I only had to use sixteen tracks but the trio sounds like a six piece. The bassist Dave Cochran and the drummer Blair Cunningham are excellent musicians — special like me. I never have to practise. I could pick up my guitar now and play you a song and it would have the vitality of the album. The right hand — man that knocked Isaac out — mah soulful right hand. I take rhythm guitar to different ground than most other musicians."

Hey Robert, meet Ted Nugent.

SUFFICE to say, Robert Johnson doesn't feel the need to keep in touch with the competition. There isn't any. The Sun classics are enough for him. In his spare time he designs and sews his own clothes.

"These pants I made, an' I designed this here shirt, and here's a pattern I'm adapting, this is an original... Make someone a nice wife. Eddie Wright peers nervously over his glasses lest we soil the precious fluorescent cloths. These two oddballs should meet McClaren and Costello."

Or not. Johnson offers short shrift to les nouveaux pingues. "The teddy boys are neat but I ain't impressed with the punk rockers. Elvis was the first guy in Memphis to wear pink and black. Two weeks ago I had to fight my way out of a hamburger joint for wearing the same stuff... long haired Woodstock veterans," he sneers.

"Ten years ago I got beat up for growin' mah hair, ironic ain't it? Recently, I was drivin' my fifties car and we pulled up by a park wearin' our gear" (cue soundtrack to "American Graffiti") "and a buncha long hairs started bollerin' at us. I says 'Are you yellin' at me?' Picked up two clubs... If you wanna take these clothes off of me buy you're welcome to try." I had my nose bust before."

One would have imagined then that Johnson could sympathise with other fashion minorities. Not at all: "The Sex Pistols came to town and they was lucky to get out alive."

A. L. I. V. E.

How so, I enquired innocently. "OOOWHEEEEE, they called out the SWAT team!" I gasp and fall off the bed. "Man... you don't mess with the SWAT team. They are T.H.T.H." Come again? "Too hard to handle. Besides, Nicky Horne" (and he should know) "told me that last year it was the fashion not to be able to play your instrument. He liked me 'cos I obviously had melody and virtuosity."

Johnson particularly detests the idea of Elvis Costello: "I never heard his music and I wouldn't listen." Why on earth not? "For... for taking the king's name in vain. Elvis is a name you don't hear fifty miles out of Memphis."

Perhaps that's because it's such a stupid name.

"Tell him from me he should be called Danny Costello. Elvis Costello, that's a hype, it's disgusting and silly."

AND so it goes. Johnson transpires to be no more than your standard ranch starb reactionary. He professes no interest in anything outside the soul circuit. "Ernie Isley is fabulous, he's like me, plays great rhythm guitar and good drums. Didja know that he plays drums on all the Isleys' records?" I didn't. "Yup, he does. I play the drums too. Either that or the nauseatingly mundane Boston: 'Tom Scholz is real good. My record is the first to come out on Infinity/MCA in America and the president of Infinity is the same guy who signed Boston to Epic.' A staggering coincidence."

By this time photog Pennie Smith and I are looking exit-ward, and Johnson is assuring me that Jerry Lee Lewis was the only original punk (only never call an American a punk or they'll punch you out for accusations of faggotry). "Jerry Lee could out cuss, out drink, out fight, out fuck... It's time to leave."

When I got home I put on the album again and its lustre was already fading. I was only sorry that I'd omitted to ask Mr Robert Johnson, why, if he's so miffed with the great pretender's apostasy, assumption of the divine right of kings, gods etc., he rejoices under a monicker not a million miles removed from that more normally associated with the erstwhile King of the Delta. Miss. blues?

So once again, fight fans, the factoid and the phantasmagorical hero are poles apart. The fantasy Robert Johnson is a lot more attractive figure. Will these people never learn?

AFLOAT!

Yes, it's the tang of the salt spray in a Force 9 from Finisterre with regard to this one, hipmates; A rollicking tale which tells how Silver's parrot changed his name (to "VIVIAN STANSHALL"), beached himself in a foetid creek and weathered the uncanny storms called up by the sea-djinns of Sargasso. AND promoted his new album. Word processing: BRIAN CASE.

MAYHAP A MOLE, unavoidably bespectacled and sedentary, withal, tickled and pinked by the prick of curiosity, flung aside his quill and quitted his rustic escriptorium — interrupted work-in-progress: 'Mine, A Memoire' — "Oh, sod these crashings and cursings!" — to present a shout at once investigatory and reproving in the threshold frame of a riverbank bunker.

Certes, the entitled source of this commotion, a vocational hack, was too preoccupied with the onslaught of insect and snagglings of bhar to note the velvet hushfulness of the future artisan's troweling, and his progress along the towpath continued to bugle out his discomfort. Some hovering hawkshaw, backtracking for a consideration, would have found the assignment "a toughie", necessitating a duplication in canon of every spasm, blurt and yaw ahead: moose from an epileptic fist.

Parting at last a sheepshank of scenery, our hero came to haven. There, caulked and confident athwart the stream, rode the venerable First World War submarine-chaser which now housed Vivian Stanshall, former Bonzo Dog wallah and reputedly reclusive as all get out. Setting a grateful plimsol upon the boarding plank abaft the boat and doffing — "BUZZ OFF!" — the composite hat of gnats, the newshound jounced aboard.

Negotiating the narrows with the ease of an old China hand, no croak, blocky Winfield Jumbo Jotter at the hip and a species of hawspiring eagerness playing about his profile, the man who had once given "Panther" Panchali a piton start on Annapurna, rounded the t'e's'le and knocked.

"Hullo."

"Hullo."

With intercourse fairly joined, scribble and subject exchanged approving shuffles. Substantially, Stanshall could have stepped from the pages of some medieval Book of Hours, accoutred as he was in a lounging gown of deepest maroon, puffed at the shoulders, nipped at the waist, a heraldry of house rats ramping colourfully at his feet. Ginger locks, severely drawn back into a decent rubber band, burst out behind him like a rusty mono-leak, while, from his chin, an unappetizing hydra of a beard plashed about his frontage until further orders. The phiz between these ginger eyes was alight with pure intelligence.

Coffee was prepared in the title galley, and conversation turned to the serviceable fowling piece propped, oily as buggery, in the snuggery.

"Ah — I'm thinking of joining a Small Bore Club," Stanshall confessed, with the accompanying chirle of the seasoned punster.

By dint of crouching, a gibbon-armed and truculently-canted posture reminiscent of our simian past, the hack launched into an urbane investigation of the low-ecinged quatters, accompanying himself with little cries. A stuffed tarantula passed under review, a glass tank of shellbacked turtles, giving rise to the reflection that a sub-chaser stocking this lot would have had the Bosh in the backward caps huffing at the periscope.

"Sunkpots," explained the host. "One of the few defensive turtles. Their design is hopeless. Lousy swimmers, knackered on land, hmn — I suppose they're passable scavengers — and they haven't changed design in a couple of million years. How DO they get on? Something like that appeals to me. Just the fact that the freak made it."

Thankful that he had retained his bicycle clips, and tremulously resolved to sell his life as dearly as he could, our hack wrung out a watery smile.

"Like snakes a lot," Stanshall continued. "Had several constrictors and a python." His keen eye took congratulatory inventory of the spartan surroundings, the grotesque masks, the jester's cap, the musical artificial leg, the solitary eyeball. "Where I used to live, it dawned on me that the rooms were Aladdin's, just bristling with the inside of my head made tangible. Didn't like looking at it — and when that broke on me, real Road to Damascus job. I've had to hack down, he really ruthless with myself, fearful pyre. Just getting rid of things and saying, 'You really are interested in tomorrow and what you're making now?' — 'Yes I am, so I don't need all this.'"

"I'd like a monkish annexe, a white room with a rrrrough table." He savoured the burly towerish syllable like a scrub-lady in the grip of some Mubdi-like possession, a chap reclaimed, it was whispered, from the hobgoblins of the bottle. "It's only recently, and almost entirely due to that wonderful woman —" — a tip of the tiler to his wife, "Longfellow" — "and living down here that I'm beginning to find some kind of balance. I NEED to write and paint and sculpt — that's going to look awful in print."

OUTSIDE, in the sunshine, our hack was soon water-vagabonding at full strength upon the deck, a votive shag tin in the shadow of his head, a beverage at his heels, tidings that the rats had buggered off below stilling finally those contractions of the anus which resemble a goldfish at feeding-time. Thus it was a relaxed hack, stripes of arcadian green and duck-dotted blue hovering under the eyelids, who drowsily contemplated the corpus of his quarry's achievement.

Quite a corpus it was! The Bunzo days alone, from the magisterial "Noises For The Leg" to the infinitely moving, infinitely compassionate "Mr Slater's Parrot" revealed a wordsmith of the first water, "a lexicographical ibex" as The Pink 'un' put it. "At the apex of his art". Parody and pastiche rubbed shoulders, bathos and pun merry-andrewed mercilessly, while, threading through the wool of the ex-Dog's oeuvre, a patrician sensibility which could sound a pea through a mattress and a fleur-de-lis birthmark on a buried bottom, ran its fine-spun thingummybob. Yes, not an easy head to live with: gothick, phantasmagoric, a prey perhaps to its pillow-crouched progeny.

"I get bits and pieces," said Stanshall, and, lifting his drowsy lids, the visitor saw that his host had changed, resolving the barley-sugar twists of whisker with a knot and anachronism with blue denim jeans. His torso, freckled and lately heckled by gnat-bites, resembled a cross section of salami.

"I get, for example, Sir Henry Rawlinson's reaction to something or other, and that goes down. Reams, miles and miles of reactions to situations, and situations in which words and phrases might find themselves. In the eleventh hour I can concentrate — but at no other time. Three days before deadline, I have this cathartic synthesis which winds up with pieces of paper all pinned together. A muscle flickering in his jaw. "It's real Backs to the Wall stuff."

"And fed by what tributaries?" enquired the hack, riffling a pack of referents suggestive of owlshness and a library card tied down for the speedy draw.

"I can't think of anyone off hand," confessed the author of "Rawlinson End". "I don't want to give Working Class Background or any of these hides, but I rely entirely on instinct. I don't want to be influenced — silly, can't it? I don't want to be influenced — silly is it? I know if I read it'll come out somewhere and they'll say AH-HAH!"

"I hear the thing rhythmically, and the game is to make that sensible. Rhythmic like 'blah-blah-blah-blah-blah-blah-di-blah-gazing dreamily through the tenebrous gauze, and faded. It's really a music hall construction, isn't it? I like things like Bertrand Russell teaching his kids the precise meaning of words. As far as the Shorter Oxford will make it, everything I do in 'Rawlinson End' I can justify. It may be a fairly tortuous and unlikely justification, but it's wrenched out. I mean, you've got to be fair."

His eyebrows rose and quivered like the brazen scales of justice.

"I find it immensely embarrassing that I'm stilted? Stumped? In conversation, I find it very difficult to communicate, and it's expected that because I use polysyllabic words in my work, I should be like that in conversation. That would be an affection. You know damn well that if you put 'pusillanimous' on someone, hardly anyone's going to know what it means, so why say it? It's all right on the record if it's the precise word and it's also got a doo-tee-doo-doo in the rhythm. That I'll buy."

"Anyway, that's why I do need to make abstractions — I mean, to relax painting or sculpting. By the same token, I think everything's the same, and had one the wit, one could translate a poem into a piece of music, or whatever."

"Why the patchwork of parody?" The hack's question, with its lemon-sucker censoriousness, implied a preference for wholecloth.

"I think it allows me to argue with myself, and get my own way in the end."

"Is your Rawlinson dynasty alive to you?" Through the hack's head, Sir Henry, Great Aunt Florrie, Lord Tarquin Portly, Hubert and Ralph Rawlinson, Reg Smection and the wrinkled retainer, Scrotum, passed in bizarre review.

"Doppelgangers," vouchsafed their creator. "They are as I am — a constant wonder. Well," he asseverated. "I think that's honest. I mean, otherwise it's BANG, isn't it?" A bony finger tapped at his temple in token artillery.

A LAUNCH pattered past with its cargo of resolute profiles. Backwash oiled under the sub-chaser, lifting it lightly and rocking the bows like an hour with a dicky ticker, while, upon the twinkling wavelets, condom-fed mullards buoyantly bobbed. An idyll indeed, reflected the hack — and knew, suddenly, surely, from God-knows-what unfathomable well of intuition, the chill of winter's damp invading the spokesheaved plank, heading the candle-lit cabin window behind which, blanketed, bothered and hemmled, the anchorette wrote. The petalled pattern of a paraffin burner on a bulkhead, its perfume plaining with patent decongestants — yes, the writer's lot was not all Johnnie-head-in-air.

"I'm flogging this as hard as I can without losing face," Stanshall was saying, apropos his album and the upcoming public recital, "my face. When the old Bonzo band went out, it was a good two years of being professional before it dawned on me that this might actually be a job. I'd thought all along — still do — that someone would find me out. They were going to realize that for the most part this was rubbish. See, this is working class shit — that work by its very nature couldn't possibly, conceivably be enjoyment. You shouldn't be up there LAUGHING, should you?"

"Or even warm," replied the hack, with a waggishness which heralded the dispersal of his wintry reverie, a clinger tenacious as a tramp's fart. They laughed unrestrainedly.

The beauty of the old band was that we had such empathy that we could all afford to take risks, and go off on a blurr-blurr-blurr stream, and if I started waggling and faltering in the end, someone back there would sense it, and then we would belt into another number. That I found exciting. But the public over here don't want to see blokes up there walking tightropes. You get ticked off, could do well, see me, should concentrate more, as you go along after every number, which doesn't leave much room to take chances. 'Canyons Of Your Mind' — I changed the recitative part of that because I was sick of doing it, and I knew damn well people'd shout for it as soon as I trod the boards. They hated it! Can't have that! If I muck about with 'Big Shot' I get heckled. Ha! You're responsible for violating an Ur-I can't live with that rot."

Was it possible that eight years had elapsed since the demise of the Bonzo Dog Doodah Band? Neil Innes joined the Monty Python team, Roger Ruskin Spear took to his Giant Kinetix Warlocke, Rodney Slater channelled his talents into Social Work, whilst Legs Larry Smith embarked for India to hunt tigers. Ah, the moving finger, once given, moves on.

Like some jungle predator, Stanshall suddenly stiffened. Not a few thews and a quorum of sinew pronounced a chap ready for the off. "It's — it's — the crossword!" he burst out. "Even as we were speaking I was being wrenched because my wife is inside there typing out the clues I've done to a crossword. It's to advertise my album. The whites lose 'em and make tiny Albert a tramp." His eyes narrowed to F6. "Tiny Albert is OK, but the whites lose 'em that's not fair on people. Also, I don't know how to spell meringue."

Clearly an emergency, and both fellows knuckled and knuckled down the narrow companionway ladder without regard to the noelies of descent until they fetched up, pell mell and hugger-mugger, in the author's quarters. "Here," said Stanshall, handing the hack of a sheaf of papers, "try your hand at the crossword!" — and unceremoniously dived for the dictionary.

Silence spread its sombre wings there below the Plimsoll Line, save for a regular gnawing of hack-teeth at the tip of a pencil.

"The incontinent Spaniard caught short in earshot?" muttered the hack, pitting the addled wits goud-eggishly at 23 across. His gaze arose from the poster and snagged upon an advertising model of a throttled chap in a tight shirt, the legend DON'T SUFFER

SHRINKAGE DISCOMFORT diverting the thisledown concentration before giving way to the Stanshall tuba.

"I.P.," said Stanshall. "Not that hard, is it?"

"Er," said the hack. He ate the pencil and stared hopelessly at a porthole of nasturtiums.

"Ah, well," cried the compiler, when a wicketless hour had elapsed, "I dread the day I'm understood!"

REMINISCENCE rose from the shadows of the dying day, a jacket spud in embers.

"My blood resonates to working-class people," Stanshall confessed, "but unless I affect a working-class accent, filter the accent somehow — it's all so dada. My grandmother had a music shop in Walthamstow but I only saw my grandfather when he was dying and trying to give me a withered orange, which is a very strong picture for me."

"My father roller-skated to The City in order to become a chartered accountant. I suppose in a mackintosh to keep the suit clean, and assiduously and commendably threatened his marriage by studying six nights a week to get this great string of litter after his name. I don't know at what point he affected this accent, but that's what I got. All my contemporaries in the streets of Walthamstow were 'ordinary.' It was very difficult. Took me through a bit of a hard time really. At school I was running with a gang of diddycriss, and being called 'The Professor' at the same time. Because I was a roll or something. I wasn't a proper Teddy Boy, wasn't any cop at fighting, got round that by drawing cartoons and telling jokes."

"Danvers," he said abruptly. "Anthony Danvers. Used to be my pseudonym. Got into Awful Scrapes, police'd ask my name. I'd say Danvers. Got away with lots of bits."

His brows bit defiantly into the rim of his monocle. "I suppose I've had to pretend almost the whole of my life."

Stanshall tilted from left to right, his slender frame describing first an acute and then a grave accent as the backwash from a passing craft jogged his lodgings. Heartily, he slapped his thigh. "This leg is much stronger than the other. I was in the merchant navy. You get a sea leg, thing pitching and tossing, recommend port or something. Great brawl in Port Said. Pure Douglas Fairbanks. There was a bloke flogging squizamaros, a dirk in a plaited leather scabbard, quid or something, bloke did a switcheroo on the squizamaros. You bought the thing and it was just a length of plaited leather with no squiz in the middle which is a bit of a swiz. I was with this giant ex-barrowboy, Tony, enormous arms, grabbed the first bloke — they're all in turbans, expect we all looked the same to them too — and started thrashing him to get my squizamaro. Then all these dusky men started pouring out of bordellos and windows, dropping down with daggers between their teeth, vegetables sprawling all over the quay. Great fight! Swim back to the ship in lukewarm water full of barracudas."

The dose of old salt's tales stirred something fine, something British in the livercore. It seemed to him as if, landlubbers and prone to blub though he was, some steadfast snooty's spirit coursed through his veins, on draught, as it were, should the hornpipe of a national jam be sounded.

"In Hong Kong, whatever you asked for, rickshaw or something to eat, they'd take you to a brothel. Inescapable. Had them all on parade, feel their tits. I'll take that one. Absolutely no way I could get an erection, strap a lolly-stick to it, nothing, not the slightest bit interested. Wound up with this woman doing an obscene, suggestive dance while a toothless gagool held a portable revolving fan over my penis."

"An odd business, this little span of ours," moved the hack. "A bit dislocated, the old allotted." He gathered his pate for a further conceptual leap.

"Rum," he said, and sat back. "In the Oxford Motel," nodded Stanshall. "There's a little pamphlet. It says, 'There are shoe-cleaning machines and trouser-presses placed in the corridors for your convenience. Should you wish to purchase one or all of these, please contact the manager.' It's all ballistic. It's all there. If I have any function at all, maybe it's just to point it out."

Teenage spots.

This new two-minute-a-day treatment has everything you need to clear them fast. Clinical tests show it works.

Spots, pimples, blackheads... aren't they a nuisance! But now, you needn't live with them for long, because now Clean and Clear is here.

Clean and Clear was specially developed by Beecham dermatologists after studying young people's skin problems just like yours. Clinical trial has shown how well it works. And it takes only two minutes a day to use.

Everything you need

Clean and Clear is different in two important ways. First, it's a medicated gel wash, not an ointment, cream or lotion. Secondly, it combines, in one preparation, everything you need to clear spots fast.

Clean and Clear cleanses thoroughly but gently — carries away excess surface oil and germs, and dries up spots. It frees blocked pores, to dissolve unsightly blackheads and it checks the cause of inflammation. What's more, it has an antibacterial agent expressly selected for its ability to penetrate and combat bacteria deeper down.

How to use Clean and Clear. Make a lather with water. Massage in for 1 minute twice daily. Rinse and pat dry.

Clinically tested

In order to demonstrate how successfully Clean and Clear works, a strictly controlled trial was undertaken in the dermatology clinic of a leading London teaching hospital.

ALBUMS

EMERSON, LAKE & PALMER
Love Beach (Atlantic)
MIKE OLDFIELD
Incantations (Virgin)

Jean Paul Sartre took mescaline once, to prove to himself that he wasn't necessarily the institution people thought he was, and as a result became convinced that he was being followed by a giant octopus. Don't laugh!

Those loyal and herdy existentialists Emerson, Lake & Palmer emerge from their massive "Being & Nothingness" maze — "Works Volumes One & Two" — with a quite imaginable nausea. "Love Beach" is, at a guess, an attempt to reassure themselves and their audience that beneath all symphonies, snowbugs, singles for the commoner — they are still Real Men, with all the attendant passions, philosophies, and tasteless pendants which this inevitably entails.

Secret longings and decimal-sexual ceremonies? Monsters created by advertising and the accretions of urban existence punctuated, from time to time, by encounters with extremely mysterious women? Prometheus himself?

Well, Pete Sinfield runs him a bloody close second, eh? Yes, this is ELP's Pop album, their Song album. The archetypal ELP settings and trappings are discarded in favour of a simpler, more sensual approach, unearthing the band's primal chemistry, their brutal, blunt, water and sun-charged Aquarian empathy, their... roots. In fact, it's almost as good as the new Clash album and — one up, Joe! — "Love Beach" was even recorded in the same studio as the last (Mighty) Diamonds album — Compass Point, Nassau, Bahamas — with the same engineer in Karl Patterson.

For some reason the opening track "All I Want Is You" — a Sinfield/Lake composition — sounds remarkably like high period Jethro Tull. "I'm coming to you..." runs the lyric — "I'm on flight 112/The airport's straight ahead." It's a very brief, introductory song, hints and muted desires twining further within each fatuous rhythmic climax. Why are they making this music, we are invited to ask? When will all be revealed?

"Love Beach" keeps us holding our breaths. "The coast is clear" we continue "I'm movin' out of here". The protagonist — he will remain unnamed throughout — moves through long hot night after long hot night, "full of plans..." He finds the object of at least part of his quest, anyway, and he tells it: "I want you by my side/Don't look so mystified!"

The realisation dawns on us as dawn is realised on "Love Beach". What we're dealing with here is a woman: "Down on your knees with your face to the wall/Saying 'Please please please'..."

"Taste Of My Love" continues with a sublimation worthy of Bad Company, Thin Lizzy or Graham Parker: "Call up room service/Order some peaches and cream/I like my desserts first/If you know what I mean/Yeah! Tasty tasty!" Cockroaches and cocaine don't come into it, he knows what he wants and by God she's gonna get it: "Get on my stallion and we'll ride!... I want to dynamite your mind with love tonight!... Climb on my rocket and we'll fly..."

Keith Emerson attacked by keyboard (we can but dream, etc.)

The new face of techno-rock (On the beach, out to lunch)

Something shifts — the seasons, the night, a pectoral — and the long hot nights are no longer a time of plans, but of "hungry women". Perhaps poverty has befallen them. Our benevolent hero turns to gambling: "Rock'n'roll, bless my soul/Lay your money down/Satisfaction guaranteed! But, 'The Gambler' intimates, 'I'll never gamble on a woman'. Who can blame him? Isn't it true, after all, that "one moment they're hot/Another ice cold"?

And then. Aw, do you really need to hear any more? That the "music" is proportionately shallow, — a squashed, fatty, cardboard and tin whine. The same old ELP twaddledly paddledly tweet weep woop compressed into meagre, mumpy backing tracking. Curtain falls.

Side two is called "Memoirs Of An Officer And A Gentleman". It is a concept. I think someone must have trodden on it. Will you sleep tonight, zombies?

Well, there's always Mike Oldfield. Mike has once more tapped the Great Cosmic Sap, working and wishing in wondrous synch with that mysterious, swelling, all-embracing social ritual we have come to know as The Christmas Rush.

As Debussy himself wrote, "music alone has the power to evoke as it will the improbable places, the unquestionable and chimerical world which works secretly on the mysterious poetry of the night, on the thousand anonymous sounds made when leaves are caressed by the rays of the moon."

Ah, "a thousand anonymous sounds"! Who could have summed up the work of Oldfield more succinctly?

"Incantations" takes up two records with its spells and spills, continuing on from wherever it was Oldfield last left us. Hergest Ridge? In a Box? Up Swaffham without a peddler? Fiddler's cave?

"Incantations" is an elongated, gibbering, insubstantial derivation, trying vainly for a turn of the century impressionistic feel for suggestion of place, the correspondences between environment and thought, the "interior landscape".

"Incantations" is merely decor. Dribbles and oddles of creme-caramel pastoral soundscaping, even encompassing some insulting "ethnic" passages: neo-African (just beat some o dem dere drums), neo-Indian, and neo-Red Indian (Maddy Prior singing Longfellow's Hiawatha, would you believe?) Sterile, snowy flutes, horns and whistles are overlaid, overlaid, and overlaid; battery hens would need benzedrine to keep apace.

"Incantation" stinks — damp and hollow. It stinks softly. While the turkeys sizzle, the snowdrops glide, and thoughts atrophy.

"Insultations". "Tubular Bells" part 101.

Mike Oldfield has had his hair cut, his beard and moustache shorn. He stands alone, forlornly and fearlessly on a dark beachhead: out of reach but still in touch, kids, a rock music cover for "classical" rock music (which is really the ultimate trick). It is thoroughly empty but refuses to lounge back and muzak (muzak: vb.

— to know one's place, to osmore rather than occupy. See also ENO) as it should do.

It has a fussy facade to make you think grand thoughts. To wholesomely hallucinate. The sun sets behind your coffee table. Under the sunlamp for another tab? (Watch out for those bastard little crabs).

And on "Love Beach" the breezes they do blow, as three anachronistic, condescending, elderly and very parenoid "rock" musicians from a by-gone age stroll about trying vainly to be mistaken for The Bee Gees.

Or maybe they're convinced that they're being followed by a giant Barry Gibb. Don't laugh!

(Who are Emerson, Lake & Palmer?)

Jingle all the way. Hey. Ho. What fun, it is.

QUEEN
Jazz (EMI)

Freddie, dahling! I'm sure you think I won't have a single good word for Queen, don't you now? Well I do. I have some very good words for Queen.

Obsolete, for one. Without a shadow of doubt. Queen are one of the more unwelcome relics of the ogre battles and self-adoration of the glam-rock heavy metal early '70s.

They took the worst elements of both styles and added a wide-screen production technique of their own. For about half an hour or so — the duration of "Sheer Heart Attack" — it actually seemed like this quening quartet, who in fact had little or nothing to do with real life rock'n'roll (one wimp academic, one ghosting prima donna, one dumb bystander and, in Roger Taylor, the macho pretty-boy exception proving the rule), might come up with the goods that were so obviously there for the making. But they didn't — nor did anyone else for that matter, really — and now, when it seems that every week brings another outstanding record to the deck, the very thought of Freddie Mercury and his posturing crew in these Seger-Springsteen-Costello days is a sheer laugh attack.

They flit from tree to tree just like a butterfly. Remember the initial connotations of their name? Glitter stage, right? And "Bohemian Rhapsody"! According to Capital Radio listeners, that bloated techno-flash epic is one of the greatest singles ever made — up there with "Bridge Over Troubled Water". And as for their insane leap on to the soccer chant bandwagon with "We Are The Champions"...

Their commercial acumen would do Larry Lamb proud. It came as little surprise to see that the latest straw Queen have clutched at is that old

TOM WAITS

Blue Valentine

(Asylum Import)

Where I come from they say you can tell where a man's going by the shine on his shoes and where he's been by the look on his face: Tom Waits still don't know how to shave properly, but his winklepickers would do a quarter moon proud.

When a person's born at sea, they're allowed to choose their nationality. So, if a person's born in a taxi — as Waits says he was, then they ought also to be able to choose what they want to call home.

Tom Waits would feel at home in places most people wouldn't walk ten yards to spit on.

The settings for "Blue Valentine" nearly all seem invested with a sleazy, sordid melancholy that has to hide its shame somehow — most readily under cover of darkness. I bet daylight makes Waits' eyes hurt.

It's a pretence, of course. Like the fake tenements of the "West Side Story" showtune that opens this album at an offbeat pace, it's an act. Waits has been working on it for five albums and who knows how many years — refining it from the sometimes maudlin angle of viewing the bottom of life through the bottom of an empty whisky bottle to altogether more poignant observations of his key characters, the loser and the used, both victims of either circumstance or the Big City or even an ugly coalition of the two. And he's good at it too. A tale-spinner worth his salt should suspend your belief for you and this Waits can do.

If last year's watershed "Foreign Affairs" passed almost unnoticed, don't let "Blue Valentine" meet with a similar fate. Waits' cool bop scat — succinctly backed by a combination of his road band and a pseudonymous George Duke — never sounded more supple. And when a crew of top draw New Orleans musicians weigh in on two tunes with some rhythm for his Ray Charles-styled blues, Waits fair blows me away.

Sample the devil-defyin' collage of classic blues imagery called "Whistlin' Past The Graveyard", and dig the tangle of lost pretty girls and petty crime that on "A Sweet Little Bullet From A Pretty Blue Gun" evokes the stale smell beneath the glamour of Tinseltown so well that Marlow himself would have had to nod sagely.

There are a thousand stories in Waits' naked city, and that was just two of them.

LONNIE DONEGAN

Sundown (Chrysalis)

When Donegan's first comeback album came out, the rock press expended many column inches recalling the great debt modern music owed to him. Well, at least we can focus a bit harder on the real issue — that someone wants us to spend five quid or so on Donegan's newest offering, and frankly it's not really on.

It's the old dilemma. Donegan did his definitive version of songs like "The Battle Of New Orleans" back in the '50s. It's not clear who'll want a re-read. The likes of Jim Keltner, Albert Lee, Ray Cooper, and Doug Kershaw are all on hand to bolster the (relatively) modern image. Donegan is in strident form on songs like Leadbetter's "I'm All Out And Down", and maybe the Americans will like what they hear.

In truth, though, this chewing gum has been on the bedpost for far too long.

Bob Edmunds

sales-force standby, tits and bums. The significance of nude women on bicycles totally escapes me. Certainly it makes a more desirable free poster than a pin-up of the band, but the emphasis Queen have chosen to place upon the visual mileage to be made out of their dreadful single "Fat Bottomed Girls" / "Bicycle Race" smacks of desperation. It's just the latest in a long line of grasping gimmicks.

Which is not to say that they're only in it for the money. The packaging and the single may be a bare-faced hard sell, but the sole object of the bulk of Queen's music is audience adulation. There is no message, nor even any communication: only performance and applause.

Which, again, is not necessarily a denigration. I like to be admired as much as the next person; I can also admire sheer technique, whether it be gymnastic, literary or musical, as much as the next goggling spectator. As long as we remember that that is Queen's only use to you or me: for us to goggle at.

Why else would anyone open an album with what they claim to be "the first Moroccan rock & roll song"? "Mustapha", it's called, and I'll take Fred's word that he's singing in yer actual Moroccan (probable translation: "Beelzebub you have a fat bottom"). Were it not for the usual stentorian clever-cleverness, it would actually be quite an interesting exercise; their need to be admired kills it.

Professor May's stupid "Fat Bottomed Girls" song follows. I can only reiterate T-Zers' group should write a song called "Fat Bottomed Queens".

Next, Mercury dons his choirboy's uniform for one of his sloppy piano ballads, "Jealous", replete with cloying multi-tracked harmonies oohing predictably along, followed by "Bicycle Race" — convolutions for convolutions' sake.

Finally, a worthwhile track! John Deacon's obviously been listening to Boston: "If You Can't Beat Them" has depth, flow, melody and surprise going for it. The side closes on Mercury bellying one of those frenetic Zep hangovers that Queen have always used to simulate onstage excitement: the exhortation "Let Me Entertain You" will no doubt become a future set opener.

On t'other side, Brian May's "Dead On Time" gives us some fast riffs to gawk at, Deacon's "In Only Seven Days" reruns a holiday romance in unexceptional fashion, and then May, who seems to have become irredeemably mawkish, offers a sanitised music-hall fantasy called "Dreamers Ball", which is as wet as it sounds.

At last, Roger Taylor gets his car in — this after all is the bloke who wrote "I'm In Love With My Car" — with a muted, raunchy offering called "Fun It". One thing in their favour: they do still stick on principle to basic guitar, bass, drums and piano.

Exit with May coming over all Wings-like — quite effectively, mind — Mercury harking daintily about "having a good time", and finally the title cut, suitably and cynically called "More Of That Jazz". "Only football gives us thrills/Rock'n'roll just pays the bills."

So go and play football, chaps. Even Queen don't believe in Queen any more.

LOU REED

Live: Take No Prisoners
(Arista Import)

Ah, Lou, we meet again. How long it's been. Ah, of course, don't tell me — "Rock 'n' Roll Heart", wasn't it? A right piece of piss that was too, as I recall, directly in the tradition of "Sally Can't Dance", "Coney Island Baby" and "Transformer".

Then I gave up bothering to even check out your subsequent product because after turning your whole style of perception — those bold, deft songs of sin and redemption, the melancholic humanity of "Pale Blue Eyes", the succinctness, the street sass, the rock lyric as dagger-sharp new journalism that you created with the Velvet Underground — into a spindled, shit-stained prostitution of the above that would have been merely obscene, were it not so goddamably sad.

Because by the time of "Rock 'n' Roll Heart" the writing was on the wall so clearly and brutally it hurt the eyes to read the statement "Lou Reed is a zombie with no compassion, with nothing to say — just another gnarled, bitter old asshole who couldn't even get the vitriol up long enough to shoot a focused wad of venom into the face of his overwhelming misery" (Even if you wrote it yourself? — Ed.).

Enter "Street Hassle". With its dumb title and lousy cover, it looked like more low-rent scum-surfer corn but, after being virtually tied to a chair to hear the thing, it hit home with a vengeance that I had formerly believed Lou Reed would never again be able to muster. Not that it was a masterpiece — nor even a flawed masterpiece, come to that. At least half the record was shoddy and self-indulgent lobotomised slop.

I mean, who really cares when Reed sings "Gimme, gimme some good times / Gimme some pain / To me they're both the same". Ho hum, my, my and boo hoo-hoo. But then there was the title track itself — and suddenly you were face to face with the old ghoul gain, except that this time there was passion, eloquence, focus, conviction and a grip on the subject matter that revived all the hallmarks of Reed at his best.

The plot line was archetypal Reed sleaze but most startling was the passage when Reed, taking on the character of junkie-host, reaches the climax of his dispassionate narrative with the lines: "You know some people got no choice / And they can never find a voice to talk with / That they can call their own / So the first thing they see / That allows them the right to be / Well, they follow it / You know — it's called Bad Luck". Great rock lyrics, and also some of Reed's best.

The fact that Reed himself knows this only too well is shown when he delivers the same verses on the version of "Street Hassle" sequestered here as the last track of side four of this double live album, itself following hard on the heels of "Hassle". In fact he even wipes out the original's savage realism by playing the role to the hilt in a manner that reminds one of nothing less than a '70s mondo-rock Montgomery Clift.

"Take No Prisoners" is another in a seemingly endless flood of double live effluvia and, although it could do with judicious sluicing down to red-hot single status, the fact remains that Reed's vengeful return from the zombie line affords this record real forcefulness.

PENNIE SMITH

On "Rock 'n' Roll Animal", Reed's first solo album to see his stupor supported by the twin axe grindings of Dick Wagner and Steve Hunter, the old lush was so out in the ozone that the speed-dervish rock toasting of the original

"White Light / White Heat", into which Reed once interjected such brainbelled methedrine jibbering as "splutter, splutter, mutter, everybody wants to kill their mother", was instead reduced into some kind of "aw, it ain't funky now" routine.

On "Take No Prisoners", however, from the very first words uttered you get the distinct impression that Reed has just killed his mother. Two minutes of rap insulting the audience, some odd ball humour and then he states his case with "I'm gonna quote a line from Yeats . . . uh, I think, which goes 'The best lack all conviction while the worst are filled with passion and intensity'. Now you figure out where I'm at."

And then, before you've had time to mull over that pearl, Reed and his band whip into the best version of "Sweet Jane" ever recorded (better even than the studio version, better than the live workouts on "1969" or "Animal") heaving that riff through eight minutes of mind-blitzed Reed verbiage — to the point where the song's original lyrics almost become an excuse for his persistent asides.

"You wanna know my politics? You give me an issue, I'll give you a tissue (pause) and wipe my arse on it" — Half of it's pure blabber, half bullseye wit worthy of Lenny Bruce, but the total is so damn relentless you can't help but be knocked out by the old sod's sheer panache. In fact, this song's power is so awesome you don't even have to care that the side degenerates through "I Wanna Be Black" (better than the original, funnier, but still basically a puerile conceit) right down to the awful "Satellite Of Love".

"No Prisoners" is very much of a hit or miss affair. Where Reed scores with "Sweet Jane", he becomes a monumental speed-freak bore on a whacked-out "Walk On The Wild Side", wherein some 17 minutes are spent babbling dispassionate vitriol at targets as diverse as American rock critic Robert Christgau and Candy Darling. It may be hilarious for the cute elite

Reed's in-humour is directed at here, but most of us couldn't give a damn. "Leave Me Alone", a straight workout of one of "Street Hassle's" better tracks, fails to redeem the side.

Similarly on side four one has to hold the piece de resistance that is the version of "Street Hassle" against the maulin drivel of "Coney Island Baby". Only side two really holds its ground with a perfect "Pale Blue Eyes" played as is and thus made genuinely moving, also the cocktail lounge languor of "Berlin", in campier a trite song but with a complimentary pacing that sparks into the quiet fire of a drastically revamped "I'm Waiting For My Man", wherein the old rock and roll dynamo is dragged down to a squalid nod-out blues that hangs in a limbo far closer to the actual limbo that smack places you in.

The rendering of "Men" segues into "Temporary Thing", the best track from "Rock 'n' Roll Heart", becoming at once oblique but strangely compelling as Reed spite out asides that seem to form some obscure sort of confessional. It holds you though, even though it teeters on the verge of tedium.

So there you have it. A brilliant single album — "Sweet Jane", "Street Hassle" and all of side two — and a compelling, perplexing, annoying double album. It's either the best or it's the worst and, since I don't have to choose, all I need to add is that Reed is back, negative and bitter, but this time he's closer to a rock 'n' roll Lenny Bruce than to the pitiful slut of yore. I'm even waiting for his next album.

Hot streets? What streets?

CHICAGO
Hot Streets (CBS)
MUD
THE POLICE
Outlandos D'Amour (A&M)

Three examples of modern mediocrity that could just as easily be Chase, Chicory Tip and The Clash. Dance in the old fashioned way.

Considering all Chicago's ideas and intrigue were exhausted by their third album (as with all rock groups, except two or three) and remembering how useless their attempts to transpose big band tight blasts into hard soul and taut rock were anyway, it may seem odd that they still parade and pretend, ten years — and Ellington knows how many facile regurgitations of those early transparent themes — on.

But, of course, they sell millions of records. It's difficult to envisage what pleasure all these sorry consumers derive from such clumsy embroidery. A recent survey discovered that 86% of Chicago consumers purchased this pitiful product because the instruments are in tune. The remaining 14% couldn't understand the question (a bit fascistic, that — sorry).

The Chicago hybrid is actually worse these days than ever it's been. They fondly cling to the docile rhythm section, derivative brass parts, feeble solos, scrappy over-arrangements and 'soulful' vocals and chant unbearable lyrics. But they've made obvious contemporary concessions, gracefully introducing tepid disco rhythms, shiny harmonies and a repulsively air-blown production. It sticks in the back of the throat. Chicago ain't no good for a blow job.

Fake, lame music. In fact, another definitive 70s rock album. Doncha just love 'em?

Mud are the missing link between Led Zeppelin... (more idiotic and integrated, less derivative and dour. This long player is haggard and banal, but more musical and matey than, say, The Who's latest collection — indeed. Mud could equally be the missing link between Brinsley Schwarz and Bethnal as between Led Zeppelin)... and The Police.

The Police comprise motley mercenaries Stewart Copeland (ex-Curved Air), a decisive drummer, Andy Summers (ex-Kevin Ayers and Kevin Coyne), a distinctive guitarist (which isn't hard), and Sting, dishy model-actor and diffident bassist, a natural but dutiful singer and a tame but negative composer.

These three plain lads are a self-styled loud hard rock group. They are immersed in punk visual butch clobber, fond of rippling neo-reggae structures (as on their wary current minor-hit "Can't Stand Losing You", included here with their previous single "Roxanne") and not averse to a bit of bop.

They're competent and detached craftsmen, hard working at crafting off the army. The album's ten well designed songs are neat but strained, and tend to run into each other. This tendency could be a plus.

Actually, as a trio, The Police achieve as much 'dynamic' density as The Clash, the same 'poetic' intensity as The Jam, even if they are twice as studied. Image (age and attitude, etc.) ultimately detracts from The Police's commercial potential. Without the trappings of The Clash or The Jam, without the comedy of The Rezillos and The Rats or the forced idiosyncrasies of the XTC animal, they seem bare. But, on the merely musical levels that such product is appreciated, they have just as much with which to lightly enthrall.

Or just as little, depending where you're sat. The Police have no ambition and too much complacency. They're not alone. Neither am I.

THE O'JAYS
So Full Of Love
(Philadelphia International)

On which the O'Jays, Philadelphia's finest, demonstrate the depth and width of their front line and produce evidence that there is still an option open to young people wary of funk and disco. (Not that I feel obliged to step into that particular ring, you understand: disco vs. every musical form devised and executed by the entire gamut of western musicians over the last twenty years, with the possible exception of Bruce Springsteen and a few women).

You want dance music with a warm heart? Don't despair, you are not alone, and the O'Jays will see you all right. From the cloudy-eyed, soft-sell charm of "Brandy", through the tall, thin, mid-tempo ease of "Use Ta Be My Girl", to "This Time Baby" with its sharp waves that skip and pop their fingers this way and that, the O'Jays demonstrate their ability to do anything you can do. Only better, and with more sass, more cool and less sweat.

And yes, if you really want disco then they can do that also. "Strokety Stroke", produced by the once great Bunny Sigler, would make the toes of at least 90% of the latter day saints of the disco circuit curl up. It's not even a well-matched bout. More like some young muscle-mouthed jerk fresh from the pinball arcade going up against the ghost of Bruce Lee. Shit, the O'Jays can do this sort of thing in bed, before getting up to go to work.

As is only to be expected from the Philly team, the musicianship is faultless and the production immaculate. And as for the O'Jays vocals, they're so much better than any other black trio's

LOUIS ARMSTRONG
A Legendary Performer (RCA)

Louis Armstrong was such a brilliant, inventive trumpeter that any record of his is bound to have numerous highspots. That said, this one is very uneven.

It's partly due to RCA trying to "sell" an essentially jazz artist by pushing his more commercial sides — most blatantly in the inclusion of the schmaltzy 1970 hit "What A Wonderful World", but also discernible in the choice of two 1930's pop medleys, which are as irritating and unsatisfactory as medleys always are — but it's also due to Armstrong's own quirkiness. His fondness for crooning spoils a few tracks, and the clowning on "Rocking Chair" become tiresome after a few hearings.

On the plus side, there are beautiful, spirited versions of "High Society", "Mahogany Hall Stomp", "St Louis Blues", "Ain't Misbehavin'" and "Basin Street Blues", the latter two of which also feature some moments of his delightful scatting.

There are six tracks with his 1933 big band, two from 1932, and one from 1946 (with Kid Ory) and three from 1947 (with Jack Teagarden), two of which are live. The 1933 tracks are easily the most exciting on this album, though I'm inclined to think Armstrong's best work was done in the '20s with the Hot Five, the Hot Seven and with the accompaniment of the great Earl Hines. The pick of those recordings are available on a CBS double, "The Genius Of Louis Armstrong", which I recommend wholeheartedly.

"A Legendary Performer" has some nice stuff, but it's not all the kind of which legends are made.

GREGORY ISSACS
Cool Ruler (Front Line)
VIVIAN WEATHERS
Heavy Weathers (Front Line)
HARRY MUDDIE MEETS KING
TUBBY'S
In Dub Conference Volume
One (Moodisc)

Pete Ubu have summed it up better than anyone, of course, better than all the impenetrable elitist verbiage of sociological skank: dub (reggae) is housing.

Or should be, and should be conveyed as such. A framework which functions in and through the present. Throw a way.

Gregory Issacs and Vivian Weathers slip nicely and noiselessly off the Virgin Front Line conveyance belt. Lifeless and never loud enough. Like the German ECM jazz label, the Front Line seems to operate a recording process wherein the finest and fieriest of artists are lacquered into a limp, commercial, wicker craft-work whole. Approximately the sum of its pitter pats.

The latest in a long framed line, Issacs is a Master whose indefinable, essential quality has been flattened nor flattered by release on the Front Line. Recorded at a better studio (Channel One) with better musicians, but "Cool Ruler" seems redolent of measurements rather than the expected magnificence. Channel One and Issacs enjoy a privileged reputation amongst reggae fanatics, one which first time buyers — the Front Line's aim? — will find wanting. This is flat and featureless. Bungalow music. Second best.

Whereas Weathers seems to be a case of pre-fabrication. A singer-songwriter FL protege and, as an honest acquaintance remarked, somewhat of a reggae (muzak) Cat Stevens. If that's what you want (a Christmas TOTP skank?).

Neh, you don't want that, won't take what's just given, what's made to be made available. Dub isn't an official secret! Wake up your walls! "In Dub Conference" is a random hold, a pick a little dated you might say, but then who cares what you say anyway? On tracks like "Full Dose Of Dub" and "Heavy Duty Dub" all dry dummy definitions and distinctions are forgotten; no packaged warp, dance your way out of the constrictions.

This is chance, sharp change. A piercing, slack, nutty split-atom jigsaw - sea - of - sound which, you realise suddenly, is out - of - synch not only with its own rhythms but with most Western reasoning and rationalizing over and above musical relationships.

There are no degrees of importance between 'foreground' and 'background', producer and artiste, improvisation and technique, etcetera (listen to the knots some Western musicians get themselves into when trying to justify either the absence or existence of technique in their 'free' music).

DUB: If Yes or AC/DC were spliced up and fed through an architectural computer or Concorde's pieces put together by a 'primitive' civilisation (making it a mosaic about the impossibility of flight?) A mood not a chapel. A style not a sermon. Now there's nothing between Dub and housing bar YOU!

PETER SKELLERN
Skellern (Mercury)
MANHATTAN TRANSFER
Live (Atlantic)

Like Ian Dury, Peter Skellern sings with a distinct English regional accent. But where Dury takes the music hall as his starting point, Skellern works in a far less hallowed tradition: schmaltz.

Skellern's forte is romantic crooning, and you're bound to admire the skill and the nerve with which he does it. On the ten cuts here, he's backed by the Grimthorpe Colliery Band, whom we may take it have little time for limp-wristed poseurs.

And yet, here's Skellern softly whispering his way through songs like "Love Is The Sweetest Thing", like a dinner-jacketed gigolo trying it on with a society hostess. No doubt it's the Lancashire accent that stops it all from seeming horribly precious. That, and Skellern's understated delivery which lends even the most banal sentiment some integrity.

Clearly, Skellern's a man out of time. His own song "Put Out The Flame" would have been a smash in the '20s or '30s. It's unlikely, though, that the same would have been true of the Manhattan Transfer. Their pastiches in a similar style are hideously glossy and overbearingly smug.

Their best known songs are "Chanson d'Amour" and "Tuxedo Junction", and the delivery is so flawless, it makes you want to throw up into your top hat.

Bob Edmunds

DAVID BYRON

Baby Faced Killer (Arista)
David's name is familiar Uriah Heep. I think (but not often). You couldn't tell from this album. He sings, smug, smooth and suffering from infernal discomfort, ten self-composed songs, wondering along the way whether he's in heaven or hell and judging that the way to the good life is to try a bit harder. Brave man, shrewd men.

These erratic if humble pop-rock songs rip off styles made famous and classic by such a suffocating array of popular mediocrity as Queen (hard), Wings (silly), ELO (hopeful), 10cc (slick), Leo Sayer (earnest) and David Essex (boppy). There are lots of carefully organised arrangements and David directs himself unashamedly towards the rewarding adult-orientated rock audience, TV shows and being A Personality. Towards a sense of well being. He should get some advice from Bob Geldof or Frankie Miller.

David appears to be schizophrenic or deaf. "I'm a rock'n'roller", he croons at one point "it takes a lot to bowl me over". Stubborn man, foolish man.

Paul Morley

VANGELIS

The Best Of Vangelis (RCA)
From the name — surely a Cretan warlord straddling his mountain territories, ruling with unrepentant, omnipotent force — the the names — "Pulstar", "Spiral", "Bacchanale" — to Jon Anderson — "So Long Ago So Clear", a song — this is an awesome collection, a real Rock music collection.

Wish sublimation. Nietzschean climbing, another grand guignol world, astrology, science as cabaret, synthesisers as coathooks, classicism as a railway signal box.

Have a teabag. Or, as Stravinsky once said — "I consider that music is, by its very nature, essentially powerless to express anything at all."

As for the co-ordination between man and time: (The Best Of Vangelis is a timeless, endless bubble. A tepid bath. Listen to some dub music. Synthetic, superficial, hackneyed, condescending — a real Rock music collection. Awe way! Go deh like a navy!

KATE BUSH
Lionheart (EMI)

These are the seductive voices of the year.

There's a lot of swooning, but not enough choice. Ms. Sioux, yeah, but Ms. Bush especially — she seems destined, anything from Ritz to Rolling Stone could conceivably process this coy, clean, photogenic prodigy into appealing copy. Is ours or hers a convenient age, or what?

Ritz probably is Rolling Stone, actually, and the readership could do with a new "accessible", "intellectual" pin-up. Kate Bush fits snugly, somewhere on a line from model agency cheek bones through a young Joni to Janis Ian at 17: manageable melancholy.

She got the mime troupe tuition, the Gurdjieff teaching, the vegetarianism, the beauty that stops nicely before being out of reach, and what this adds up to, as has been remarked, is the ability to "cover markets". What can stop her?

She plays cute, pastel, doldrums piano; she looks 'good' on "Lionheart's" cover, although a pernicious phenomenologist could question the presentation of Woman as Object or as Mystery Object — or, further, as Child Mystery Object.

All these themes run through her lyrics and this, presumably, acts as some kind of justification for the cover photosnap of our Kate crouching seductively atop a (costumer's?) crate in an empty, dusty attic. She is wearing a fancy dress lion's outfit, the head of which rests on the floor. There are songs called "Oh England My Lionheart" and "In The Warm Room", "Hammer Horror" and "In Search Of Peter Pan".

I look at the photo and I see an object. . . and this, more than anything, is the David Bowie (both taught by Lindsey Kemp, mime artist) connection, as it indeed is with the pantherish, pale, primall) donna Banshee. And, like Sioux, Kate is sometimes rather clumsy when it comes to hanging lyrics on the image (or is it the other way round?).

"Lionheart" starts with words which could easily slot into "The Screem": "Blue on the walls, Blue out of my mouth" ("Symphony In Blue"). But where a Banshee might follow that up with, say, "Blood on the walls, Blood out of my mouth", Kate goes for "The sort of blue between clouds when the sun comes out", and thereby covers the markets.

She can even get away with "When that feeling of meaningless sets in" — that, and "The more I think about sex/The better it gets/Here we have a purpose in life".

I hate quoting lyrics, but when they're printed on the sleeve it must be for a reason — usually that the singer in question thinks of himself as a songwriter, a communicator of meaningful messages, and as such is up for discursive analyses from the scurvy, common likes of I and you.

Kate's trick is the way she clings to thoughts of Innocence (capital M) and Better Times, at the same time hinting that, you know, she knows and has known more than she's letting on. 'Mature' lyrics sung in that twee, irritating schoolgirl-siren voice. I know you can't help your voice, dear, but then I can't help being irritated by it.

Actually, most of the time she's nearer a vague British lineage — Barbara Dickson to Lindsay De Paul — than any Joni/Janis wonderland. It's the 'up' side of melancholy: muted, mellifluous piano backed by a lame, loveless cradle of pristine and processed acoustic/electric guitar, drums, subtle synthesiser, bass and varied additions where necessary, harmonium, recorder and harpsichord in the tree top. Her musicians add little or nothing to most of the songs, and her own piano playing is too 'nice' to merely be the prop it mostly is.

The songs range from "In Search Of Peter Pan" ("I've been told, when I get older/That I'll understand it all") to "In The Warm Room": "She prepares to go to bed/She'll let you watch her undress/Go places where your fingers long to linger/In the warm room/You'll fall into her like a pillow/Her thighs are as soft as marshmallows."

Now, for all I know, that last lot might well be an attack on traditional, mythical ideas and ideals about the mysterious, silent, seductive woman who somewhere waits for you and you only. But nothing in the way it is presented and nothing in the way Ms. Bush presents herself in the glossy, glazed photographs suggests that this is indeed the case.

Other cameos and scenarios fit with the exotic ("Kashka From Baghdad") and historic ("England My Lionheart", "Coffee Homeground") without really saying much, mostly metaphors for dewy romanticism, the pleasures and pains thereof.

Nothing wrong with that? The Sirens, too, sing that way. Trying to disguise that which pressed them into their fame and fashion but allowed them to feel nothing but function. They lamented this aloud. They could not help it if their laments sounded so beautiful.

ANYTIME...

After a century of manufacturing pianos, Yamaha have developed the first electric grand piano, the CP-70.

A robust instrument built for touring, it embodies the traditional quality and craftsmanship that has made Yamaha the largest piano manufacturer in the world. It has the sound and feel of a concert grand and produces a faultlessly amplified acoustic sound.

The other electric pianos in the Yamaha range, the CP-20 and the CP-30 are both touch sensitive, like the traditional instrument, but inside they are pure electronics, a typical Yamaha combination of tradition meeting technology; the pianos only they could build because no-one else quite knew how.

TOOLS OF THE TRADE

INSTRUMENTS: BY JOHN POTTER

If they ever do a disco version of "Chopsticks"...

ONCE UPON a time, as the fairy stories go, there were basically three types of keyboard instrument. The harpsichord, with its quaint zinging tone, whose notes were produced by means of a leather quill twitching its strings. The piano, whose strings were struck with hammers to provide the required note. And the very elaborate organ-type instruments, whose notes were produced by compressed air going through pipes of the required diameter.

These were the instruments available in the days before electricity changed things.

When music began to take on more complicated, even mathematical proportions — about the middle 1800's — the keyboard seems to have been one of the few instruments capable of expressing the ideas of most contemporary composers.

But time marches on, and the advent of electricity did very definitely change the situation. We now have electric harpsichord/pianos, electric organs, and a whole range of keyboard instruments which are partly mechanical, partly electronic and some wholly electronic, except for the actual keyboard itself.

So, today we have an amazing range of sounds to enjoy, compare with, substitute with (strings etc.) and this can in itself cause problems, believe it or not, because where do you actually begin to explore the keyboard world?

Well, I for one still tend to be rather conservative so far as keyboards go, and the conventional piano, for me, is still the king of the musical instruments.

In a studio the conventional steam piano has no particular problems, but on the road it is a totally different story. It is difficult to move, difficult to amplify, and rarely stays in tune. Even the celebrated Yamaha electric grand CP 70, which is an actual miniature grand piano, has tuning problems (especially at the bass end) and the "feel" of this mini-grand also tends to be rather abrupt.

During my spell with Wilko Johnson's Solid Senders, I used one of these and I must say, at first I found it very refreshing to play an actual miniature grand on stage; but, at the Manor Studios, recording the "Solid Senders" album, the tuning problems developed. We phoned Yamaha and they sent down an immediate replacement, but the new one was not that much better. Nevertheless, top marks for their service department.

Other quite good substitutes for an almost-real piano sound on stage may be the Roland EP 20 and the R.M.I. piano, both of which have ceased to be manufactured, although they can still be obtained (R.M.I.'s being like gold dust and EP 20's looking rather puny on stage unless surrounded by lots of other keyboards).

All of which leads up to a gap.

The clavinet is another strung keyboard instrument which has quite good pianistic qualities, using hammers for the action, and being touch sensitive — that is to say, the harder you hit the keys, the louder they play on the end of each string.

The total sound reproduced by the clavinet is quite attractive in its quaintly percussive tone. In fact we use clavinet "D6" on one of the tracks on the "Southend Rock" album due out in January, a song called "Better Get Out."

Although the clavinet is not an instrument that can be used on all types of songs and music, it can still be used to great effect in moderation, particularly on very rhythmic music, funk, rock, etc.

Hohner have hit upon a new instrument in this field, a single keyboard, called the Clavinet-pianet Duo. If you lift the lid on this fine tool, you'll see that it incorporates the mechanicals of both the Hohner Pianet 'T' and the clavinet. Being very portable, with a very good feel, and with this unique combination of sounds, not being an organ type instrument, or synthesiser, it is much nearer to the rock, boogie, funk keyboard players' heart.

I used one of these Duos on a gig last week with my new band Potter's Clay and it proved to be an admirable asset. The stage sound through an H.I.F. 100 was at very least earthy and powerful.

ONE OF my favourite artists since the year dot has been Jerry Lee Lewis. Particularly for his magical left hand boogieing, which I unashamedly admit that I try to imitate (and think maybe I succeed a little, especially on a conventional piano.) Electric pianos are not so easy to do this with, as the sound is normally far too thin to be effective, the feel being a little like playing a bag of feathers.

The new Duo seems to have solved these problems to some extent. As the instrument is basically of a schizophrenic nature, one can obtain the mellower sound of the pianet, or the more edgy sound of the clavinet. As the keys are played, both clavinet and pianet notes are struck, and one can obtain both sounds at one time — or a combination of both — by means of faders.

Other switches on the duo are basically tone controls, and a selector switch can make half the instrument — say, the bass end — into a clavinet and the other half into a pianet; and vice-versa, although quite what the purpose of this is, I'm not too sure.

The only fault I would say is the fact that the clavinet fader, when pushed to full position, tends to feed back; but using 100 watts or more will more or less eliminate this. Maybe a slightly longer keyboard, say one more octave or less, would give it just that extra bit of range. It would then be very hard to find another competitive electric piano.

However, overall it is a very fine instrument as it is, and I'm sure there will be many happy Duo players soon thumping away.

NATIONWIDE GIG GUIDE

GEN X AND DEVO TOURS

GENERATION X go back on the road this week, after their long summer lay-off, and their return is admirably timed to coincide with the release of their new album "Intercourse (Old Meets New)". Their initial bill-topping gigs are at High Wycombe (Friday), Northampton (Saturday), Croydon (Sunday) and Cardiff (Tuesday). Then on Wednesday, they appear at the giant Wembley Arena in North London, along with The Jam and The Pirates — this, of course, is the first of the three concerts being presented at that venue under the banner of Great British Music Festival.

DEVO are about to begin their first headlining tour of Britain, the opening three dates being at Edinburgh (Sunday), Glasgow (Monday) and Newcastle (Wednesday). It's the first time they've been back here since their rather controversial Knabworth appearance in the summer — which produced widely mixed reports, some critics hailing them as brilliant, and others dismissing them as trivial. Either way, there can be no disputing their popularity over here, judging from the success of their recent album "Are We Not Men? — We Are Devo!". And that, after all, is the name of the game.

ERIC CLAPTON returns to the British concert platform for the first time since his quest spot with Bob Dylan at Blackbushe. Backed by his regular band and with the near-legendarily Muddy Waters as special guest, he opens at Glasgow (Friday), Newcastle (Saturday), Hanley (Tuesday) and West Bromwich (Wednesday).

JAMES BROWN is one of those giants of rock and r-and-b, whose name will always have an assured place in any history of contemporary music, even if it's written two centuries hence! Together with his full U.S. touring revue, he's back again for gigs at London Hammersmith (Friday) — and Manchester (Saturday).

PERE UBU: PHOT. DENIS O'REGAN

Missing Link in Chislehurst Caves

Pere Ubu

Chislehurst

Through no fault of my own I found myself journeying to the unstimulating Chislehurst Caves amongst 'colourful' 'witty' press and other liggers on a custom built coach.

I now believe in make believe. A number of other coaches carried real people to this mystery venue.

The Caves' management probably gave permission for their 'pretty' caves to be abused because they understood it was an Educational Visit. Perhaps it was.

Whatever, Chrysalis were no doubt pleased with this unethical commercial for one of their more serious acts. And all the real people enjoyed their cheap treat: Marble Arch to Chislehurst Caves and back. Fun, fun, dumb.

Pere Ubu selling themselves at the Caves was like bringing Coltrane's "Giant Steps" out as a picture disc. But Ubu inevitably transcended the occasion, the environment, the hard sell.

They followed the unsettling Red Crayola duo, who staged a devilish random act. The drummer played with the sense and feel of John Stevens or Dick Wits, fighting and dislocating Mayo's restless guitar so that the sound stretched, scratched and was both funny and inventive.

After this absorbing stark versatility, Pere Ubu's prodigious and intricate messiveness dragged listeners to another side of passion; a darker, deceptive side. It was a suggestive contrast.

Squashed between two knobby cave walls, the quintet naturally kept it safe but still demonstrated extremes of control and dynamics experienced in only the very best pop music.

The five members possess an unnerving instinct for manipulating textures and sounds while the roles of the instruments are meticulously defined: The apparently unruly guitar and synthesiser, the exclusive sax, the carefully compiled drumming and the methodical bass roaming the innards of the sound.

The music lurches, explodes, intrudes, exorcises, it's a juxtaposition of stringent structure and agile spontaneity experienced in only the very best music. They make most other pop groups seem comparatively simple minded.

Vocalist David Thomas—a large, dishevelled person—deliriously fights to squeeze out and justify the words. He's a visual representation of Ubu (funny, disturbing, exhausting and massive), and his singing somehow signifies Ubu's penetrative, mysterious insight.

His un-coordinated between song reps continued the Lydon/Devote line of unconformably communicating pleasanties in the contrived circumstances of a 'gig'—but more cheerfully so.

"Maybe I should get into some sort of audience rapport here," he deadpanned after a few severe tunes. "What do I say... how are you doing?"

Most of the time he scat sang in the gaps. He is irrepressible, and for Ubu indispensable, as in fact they all are.

Pere Ubu are democratic, devastating and dramatic—even on such a restrictive night. Crucially, they are essentially tidy and accessible (you do get what you put in). As Rambali said, for your own sake do not respond before stimuli.

The missing link (and there has to be one) between Family and The Spontaneous Music Ensemble.

Neil Young

Los Angeles

Neil Young may not be a consistent artist, but he's an important and intriguing figure in contemporary music.

His last but one Studio LP "American Stars 'n' Bars" returned to the basics of his early sound. The upbeat vital charge of the set was a far cry from the introspective ache dominating the disillusioned "Tonight's The Night" and reflective "Zuma"; two of his most difficult works. If the last LP and Stills-Young effort revealed him moving towards a more optimistic stance, his latest tour and work "Comes A Time" finds him regenerated.

Young's concert at the Los Angeles Forum was lively and theatrical, using a surprising cast of actors and props.

As the show opened with a screeching tape of Jimi Hendrix's "Star Spangled Banner", running into The Beatles' "A Day In The Life", a motley crew of hooded creatures with glowing red eyes (much like the Jewas creatures of Star Wars) began to erect the staging. Huge replica footlockers, a giant microphone, a racing chariot and water glass were all on the platform.

Suddenly, Young was revealed sleeping on an oversized speaker cabinet. Awakening, he dreamily peered about, picked up his acoustic guitar and played "Sugar Mountain" followed by an innocent reading of "I Am A Child".

Wearing a Jackson Browne T-shirt, he eased his way through a selection of solo numbers accompanying himself on piano, harmonica, and guitar.

"Comes A Time" and "Already One" quickly established the immediacy of the new LP. And he finished the acoustic set with a tender reading of "After The Goldrush", then, from his punk film escapade earlier this year the new tune "Rock 'n' Roll Is Here To Stay". Tracing the plight of someone with a rock career ageing, he singles out Johnny Rotten, and proclaims, "It's better to burn out, then fade away."

Stage hands dressed as conheads, psychiatrists and professors set up the stage for the electric set while the Woodstock soundtrack filled the hall. But as Crazy Horse came on, the theatrical edge began to reek of gimmickry, becoming nothing more than a distraction. And the increased volume reduced many of Young's best songs to muddles.

Attempting to balance his set Young played such standards as "The Loner", "The Needle And The Damage Done" and "Cinnamon Girl", interspersed with pieces from the latest album. "Lotta Love", a simple but enticing song, is a certainty for his next top tenner.

Absent were classics like "Heart Of Gold", "Harvest", "Down By The River" and "Cowgirl In The Sand". But it's understandable that Young now feels he doesn't have to pay homage to his past.

In fact, with this show it seems Young wants to prove he has re-discovered himself after a period of drifting and self-evaluation.

The uneven but sometimes impressive two hour set closed with "Tonight's The Night" and a refrain of "Rock 'n' Roll Is Here To Stay", suggesting that Young is a survivor. He isn't going to fade away... not if he has anything to say about it.

Be Stiff

Lyceum

WHEN is an event something of a non-event but fairly entertaining in a hot, sweaty, crowded sort of way?

Answer: when Stiff Records attempt to duplicate success by dragging a bunch of relatively unknown proteges of certain minor league appeal around Great Britain finally winding down at London's Lyceum.

Last time around, there were aces in the pack—with Msrs. Costello, Lowe and Drury making for an invigorating barney, and high expectations. This time there's Akron's teenage Rachel Sweet, Lene Lovich, Jona Lewie, Southend mini-legend Mickey Jupp and second-time-rounder

Wreckless Eric

Still, the Lyceum was packed out—just like at the first affair.

So... who'll be the lucky ones to win acceptance? Got me there, sure.

Will Birch's Records (who are not Stiff artists and signed to Virgin, fact fans) play a hardy, brusque set of melodies soft rock-origins mixing with the odd non-original like Tim Moore's "Rock 'n' Roll Letter" that make the group sound like those few early 70's U.S. anglophile bands like The Raspberries.

The songs sound promising, the group look alright, they don't make much initial impression, but they do possess a strong songwriter in drummer Birch.

In fact, out of most of present company, Birch & Co. stand out with a greater strength.

Rachel Sweet, whom they back up, isn't worthy of them. An unimpressive voice with unimpressive songs, all she seems to have in abundance is 17-year-old post-adolescent charm.

Her version of "Alison" gave the proceedings a sickly sagging pallor early on in the evening.

Similarly Jona Lewie fails to impress. He plays piano well enough, but his songs don't stand up to much scrutiny. It's hard to imagine him doing anything beyond knocking out the odd one-off freak hit—which he's already done as "Terry Dactyl" with "Seaside Shuffle" (which, incidentally, he played).

Main honours must rest with Jupp, Eric and/or Lovich. Mickey Jupp rocks with authority if not a touch athletically. An old rock 'n' roller, he's a strict 12-to-the-bar man who does what he does well.

It was still gratifying to see him get a lusty round of applause.

Wreckless Eric proved yet again that his whole 'piss-artist' charm and talent for capturing all those embarrassing undercurrents in his lyrics is still too slight for him to take on the stature of a Dury or Costello.

He had a good band with two guitarists—Eunon Brady and Malcolm Marley—and it was for them, more than the little 'gink' fronting, that I felt the applause (again enthusiastically exuberant) was justified.

Finally, Lene Lovich—in five songs—delivered something of substance. With easily the best band, her rendition of originals like "Home Is Where The Heart Is" showed talent of considerable proportions, the substance in her songs easily matching her adroit renditions. After all the hoopla, it'll be looking out for Radical need for a hit single

XTC

London

XTC are a tempting, shallow pop group lacking the string of hit singles if not the audience of the comedy line that stretches from The Rezillos through to X-Ray Spex.

XTC are professionals at executing self-regulating, stylistic, almost satirical fun muzak and presenting it with the colour and overemphasis that could easily be called manipulative if it wasn't so patently harmless. They are well designed, legitimately slapstick, determined (in both senses) and impermanent.

Without hit singles, I'd say they have, as they are now, another year's worth. With hits, three years.

Their inventiveness is overrated. They accidentally stumbled on a particularly alluring process of vigour, rhythm, comfort and whimsy that has with, minimal elaboration and replenishment, fuelled them through a couple of mischievous albums. Once that process was discovered additional details and tricks were obvious and natural.

Eighteen months experience has instilled strength and style, so that their performances are invariably impeccable and direct, but there has been no exciting reinforcement of a sound that has taken "Judy Teen" and "Virginia Plain" to an effervescent but impoverished conclusion.

XTC make the pop muzak that Eno would like to have done full stop. It is their rut and I don't think they're too perturbed. Let's hope they have the sensitivity to self-destruct or at least consider a new energy. (Their flirtation with dub was very nonsensical — XTC have nonsense as one of their middle names.)

This bright, cretinous set (which could only have worked at the seatless Electric Ballroom) exemplified why XTC continue failing to take their correct place in the singles charts and complete the "concept". They can't seem to contrive a suitably freaky but necessarily plain mid-paced tune.

When they are at their best, typically brisk and imbecilic, they are too fussy for the radio. When they produce something like "Statue Of Liberty", a controlled but still tantalising piece, its composure reveals too barely XTC mannerisms that are best left unscrutinised.

Singleswise, XTC cannot do a thing right. Too fidgety, or too bald. It is a shame, because without hit singles XTC (the legend) will be incomplete.

They're at their best live. They have transformed themselves into a smashing, restless stage act. Teasing, brash and cleverly moronic, any petty defects being irrelevant. They play for the then and now, and their maniacal overstatements and exaggerations, both in music and gesture, are delightful.

Never overly distant, clever or cold, just logically illogical and coolly lucid, they entertain with an alertness and dazzling hysteria that is very difficult to scorn. Unphilosophical, amoral — but a literate, passionate fun. This means they are worth paying to see.

I'd like to believe that they smile at art's inadequacies, ironically mocking them, their own puzzle a link of absurdity and abstraction streaked with shadows of discomfort, but I believe they're just a momentary, improbable explosion with a world view that essentially refuses reality. I don't mind. They make me grin. No pretense to radical redefinition, and none there.

Third World

100 Club

It is surely not coincidental that now Island seem to have relegated Bob Marley and company to the status of lampoonery with joke titled albums they should meanwhile have nurtured an outfit capable of becoming as big, if not bigger, than The Waiters (RIP).

Make no mistake about it, Third World are going to be massive; have already, in fact, taken positive steps in this direction, as testified by the group's performance at London's 100 Club last Thursday.

In spite of criticism that they have forsaken their roots (whatever that means), their growing popularity since the success of "Now That We've Found Love" — not to mention impressive onstage dynamism — precipitated an ecstatic reception from the ram-up crowd.

So, why wasn't I impressed?

Third World play sharp, tight, lyrical, superb jazz-reggae. And since joined by former Upsetter singer Bunny Clarke, the group's vocals are virtually without peer in JA music.

However, the overall effect of this middle-class 'society' band's artistic achievement is a dull, hand-clapping bland-out.

The crowd they attracted was not the usual 100 Club assortment of blacks, punks, ANL intellectuals, skinheads, Ford workers and other oddballs, but a gathering of — eh-eh — normal, happy-go-lucky folk; like a convention of liberal shipping-office clerks on their night out.

And this is just about where Third World stand... and fall.

There is no frustration in these one time Alpha boys' muse, merely bellyful, good time bump 'n' grind KC and The Sunshine breakfast passivity. Miserable wretch that I am, me a prefer a little more hunger and a great deal more depth in my art, you no see it?

Angelo Paladino

North London Poly. Returning to live work for the first time since they had £2,000 worth of uninsured equipment nicked. Angelo Paladino were understandably rusty when they played NLP.

But despite a topid beginning and tuning hassles towards the end, Angelo turned in a set that flickered with the fire of a bright future. They hit their stride about halfway through with the brooding "Sweet Miss D", followed with their own "I'm Ready" and great version of Chuck Berry's "No Money Down", with Angelo himself and Steve Massett exchanging beautifully fierce guitar licks.

The smouldering "Just Another Blues" came next, then "Surrender To The Night" reminiscent of the Brinsleys at their best.

Angelo sings and writes like a subtle Graham Parker; and the band (Angelo, Steve, plus Dave Callaghan on bass and Terry Murphy on drums) can rock hard and tight, though they only hit their peak occasionally.

Modern wave becomes dribble

Wire

London
And... in the death — as a waitress service brought the hamburgers for some of those sitting down at the tables and chairs that lined a cold and cavernous theatre wall to wall — bored mutant eyes gazed up towards a stage with a carpet! This ain't rock 'n roll — this is the Virgin Venue.

And this ain't the modern wave I'd dreamt about — this is Wire.

Never before have I seen such a lack of either empathy or friction between a band and its audience. Watching Wire onstage is like sitting in on a disinterested group wandering aimlessly through an unspectacular repertoire in a dimly-lit rehearsal studio.

They play with about as much enthusiasm as someone living in a bedsit would muster to go to the launderette.

Some fools might claim they are part of that stomachable in-vogue trend towards non-performance and destruction of the hackneyed normal rock poses. In reality, they are just plain unexciting.

And the dirty linen sho' nuff hits the fan.

Their music dribbles rather than flows. There is no breadth, no imagination, no tension. No sadness, no joy in their particular world view. Just mannered, contrived, po-faced pretension.

Of course, what at first appears superficially monotonous often assumes texture and bite with familiarity and deeper probing — The Ramones and The Clash in 1976 through Buzzcocks to Siouxsie right now have proved that. But Wire's monochromatic dirges simply have no teeth whatsoever. And this Venue showing left me — and, I'd guess, any other sensitive souls present — totally unmoved, struggling to stifle the yawns.

Part of the reason probably rests in the venue itself. It's not my idea of the perfect showplace — but I'd still stifle the lion's share of the blame for my miserable evening out squarely on the shoulders of the band.

They make no effort to communicate anything to the audience — a breakdown that extends far beyond avoiding any of the old, clichéd pandering.

For most of their set the four-piece line-up was bolstered stage left by a barely audible organist. Now, introducing him would have been helpful — sometimes it's nice to know these things — but, of course, it would have also meant acknowledging the punters... and that's out for a start isn't it?

When playing, Wire — self-conscious in the extreme — look more at each other than the paying fans. The joke(?) is extended to their steadfast refusal to encore despite vociferous chants from the few out of their seats at the front. (Yes, some people actually clap as they watch Wire crawl drearily up their own rectums).

This is not a pre-planned hatchet job either. Before this gig, I was never quite sure about Wire — occasionally their records had even mildly aroused me in a cool, calculated sort of way. At least I know now...

Wire border on unlistenable, listless tedium.
Adrian Thrills

Albert King

London

Unlike B. B. Albert King has no truck with Las Vegas show biz devices.

Save for a build-up from his guitarist — the aptly named Half Pint — he lets his music do the talking.

"And now, the hard working, legend in his lifetime, Albert King," announces Half Pint.

He puffs confidently on a pipe; takes off his titty and sidles up the mike, his left-hand Flying V guitar ready and set.

Working with just keyboards (the bare minimum), bass and drums, King launches into a sound that's raw and unsophisticated — probably not all that different from when he earned his spurs in the early Fifties in Chicago.

There's barely a sweet note in his musical vocabulary, and it's this rancorous which has made him a must for white R&B musicians.

In the late 60s he was at a creative peak with his "King Of The Blues Guitar" album on Stax. "Born Under A Bad Sign" dates from this period and his arrangement at Hammersmith bears no alterations from the original.

Half Pint's jazz-orientated guitar — like George Benson with teeth — serves as the perfect foil for King's harsh runs. Often than not King closes a number by following Pint's lyrical, and, it must be said technically superior guitar, with his abrasive high volume playing.

Very effective, but a little like a bumptious schoolboy whose mastered a particularly good, say, football manoeuvre showing a novice that he can do better than him.

In fact, the first hour of the lengthy set had me enthralled, only his nervous band (Albert appeared to continually chide his keyboard player, and the rhythm section looked anything but relaxed) detracting from the sheer thrill of it all.

But as the set wore on I became increasingly aware of King's limitations. All right, Keith Richards is repetitive too... but you don't notice it, do ya? Put it down to Monday night tiredness, because the rest of the crowd couldn't get enough.

Steve Clarke

Whitesnake

Oxford New Theatre

Now that Jon Lord has joined David Coverdale's Whitesnake the feeling is that with two ex-Purples instead of one the crowd-pulling moniker is not essential, enabling the group to operate more as a unit than as support band to a Big Star.

Coverdale is still very much the leader, though, providing the sweating, screeching focal point and contorting his large frame into the familiar macho postures.

We got a show that was entertaining, exciting in parts, and superficial — any subtlety that the band were capable of having been confined to the locker room during performance.

Much of the credit for the excitement must go to Mickey Moody whose slide guitar provided a constant electric undercurrent to the set and broke out onto the surface with solos like "Nighthawk" from the album. Coverdale's own best performance was "Mistreated" from a solo album, combining pained vocals, pelvic thrusts and microphone abuse.

Jon Lord, who maintained a low profile, eventually contributed a modest solo, moving from Mephistophelean Cathedral through Rinky-Dink good time to Cinema Wurlitzer without a ruffle.

"Day Tripper" was an excursion into Vanilla Fudge territory, and "Lie Down (I Think I Love You)", "Trouble" and "Don't Mess With Me" were standard heavy rock numbers enlivened by a reasonable regard for pace.

My verdict must be that Whitesnake, on stage at any rate, are intermittently exciting and disposable. There's just no mystery in it. They got a great reaction, but they must get awfully tired of looking for new audiences.

John Cooper Clarke

Leeds

Enter Johnny Clarke (subterranean, yes; homesick, no), the personification of strife itself, several years overdue, and the second latterday poet (Dire Straits Mark Knopfler being the first) to get the genius accolade.

Shuffling his hands horizontally, jogging on the spot (Cagneyesque, and especially appropriate for "Tracksuit"), Cooper Clarke literally stunned a full house of crossover student punters and cult excursionists with his wide selection of updated beatpoems.

He revives the spirit of Barry MacSweeney, Roger McGough and Adrian Henri, but ultimately he transcends them all. It's a laugh a line.

As a live performer, Cooper Clarke is peerless: the Salfordian nasal intonation, the occasional choke at his own joke, the brown leather jacket, the "Blonde On Blonde" scarf, the geometrically correct shades. He looks like Dylan around '65, and his delivery — the stream of consciousness, no-superfluous-action style — reminded me of Zim's "Desolation Row" played at 78 r.p.m.

"Psyche Sluts 1 & 2" ("I Married A) Monster From Outer Space"), "Health Fanatic" — and all the others — brought roars of spontaneous laughter, as did the charming "You Never See A  In The Daily Express".

Clarke's brilliant turns of phrase, his acute sense of timing within the stream of consciousness 'framework', and his undeniable stage charisma, evoke total audience attention. You don't have to try to get into Johnny Clarke: he makes it all happen for you.

It was thought-provoking and soul-stirring to see Clarke bandless. He will probably need to forge a successful marriage with rock music to stay famous, popular and 'cool'. But the music to "Readers Wives" shows he's already done a good job in that department.

In any event, his new disciples at Leeds Poly genuinely couldn't get enough of Clarke. It was one of those nights when he could have read the telephone directory backwards and he would still have got laughs.

Emma Ruth

The Flies

Railway Hotel

The Flies have four heads and eight legs and they're intensely irritating.

This feeling was increased by an hour in the company of their debut album "Waikiki Beach Refugees", which favours a vast amount of semi-obscure lyrics.

There are two extremes in writing lyrics of this kind. One is when imagery is used to try and clarify (and intensify) complex ideas; the other is when it's deliberately superimposed to disguise patently obvious ones.

Both should result in sufficiently vague lyrics that instill a kind of mystical self-importance. The first method works; the second doesn't.

The Flies prefer the second approach producing a mass of ordinary impressions in a deliberately disorientating style. On their album cover the songs are illustrated with photos as stark and unarousing as the lyrics and which feature for some reason a large number of inflatable dolls.

The only positive aspect of the album is that it has variation.

But on stage even that gets the chop. No matter what their basic differences, all the songs are welded into an undistinctive slab by the ready, quavering, hideously mannered vocals of head fly, Neil O'Connor. They don't change in tone or expression, and together with his frail, wail-like form, fail to match his super-assertive stance and wideboy biker's jacket.

They are a totally non-descript and mediocre band, with nothing visually stimulating and no one number raising itself out of the bland, two-dimensional sound mix.

They put a lot of energy into signifying nothing.

They're just The Flies. They have four heads and eight legs, and they're intensely irritating.

The Edge

Nashville

Down from the wilderness in sensible shoes and my father's second best suit ... to meet newly fashionable old friends, dyed hair diseased orange, who forsake the RAR meeting to acquaint me with The Edge at the Nashville.

First, the engagingly wacky Molesters advance their career slightly by playing support here at one of London's top niteries.

Their music is messy and sprawling, of similar tempo throughout and mostly sounds the same after a while due to the strident tones of two brazen haridians who wail alongside the seedy Brian Sterling.

A new cult band. I liked them for being different and funny and probably better on longer acquaintance, and applaud throughout in defiance of the audience's cool apathy.

The Edge are another of these new music bands. Imagine lots of impressionist review words like 'teut' and 'angular' spread throughout this piece to describe them ...

Teenage pin-up publicity is out: they look like gaunt Russian dissidents entertaining friends in a labour camp. The Edge vary between a kind of nervous punk thrash "21st Century Schizoid Man" sound; impenetrable Mahavishnu Orchestra's entire output played simultaneously, keyboards bristling and stabbing.

John Cooper Clarke Pic: HFEARN

It's a fierce, jerky sound halfway between XTC's more extreme moments and a sprightlier Stranglers. Lu's Burnellesque bellow dominates vocally, though Glyn Hevard and Gavin Povey sing too, separately or in various combinations, all three together proving the most effective.

They're fairly unique, I have to admit.

It's not pleasant music. It's ugly and intense. Once the band stop being fashionable I expect their average audience to be predominantly male, quiet and studious, alone and inscrutable in dark clothes, discreetly tapping a foot, arms folded.

Glen Gibson

The Streets

Windsor Castle

Since their Roxy Club debut in '77, The Streets have gained a modicum of notoriety in minor league circles by completely upstaging the acts for whom they played support.

Exuberant, acrobatic and quite original, their loud repertoire features twelve self-penned songs ranging from dreadful to inspired.

A strident ditty called "Flasher" shows there's more to reincoats than meets the eye. And other memorable numbers include "Negative Response", "Street Kid", (replete with weaponry), "Prognosis/Neurosis" and "Television Addict" (featuring macabre contortions with a telly that disintegrates into a cloud of confetti).

The Streets are Ricky Waltier (singer, biceps, and cat-suit), Bartholomew J. Smith (guitar and Keef Richard impersonations), Will James in the traps and Franky Five Fingers Joddi on bass. They're in their early 20s and look respectably degenerate.

On stage they display a healthy confidence which belies their relative inexperience, with Bart J. Handling his axe remarkably well, playing some of the greasiest riffs around.

At worst they're like a 747 revving through headphones. At best, Guinness glasses are pogoing on the shelves.

Rick Joseph

Richard and Linda Thompson

Theatre Royal

There are four people whose records I would unreservedly acquire, even if the content was confined to their reading an 1888 issue of Bradshaw's Railway Guide.

They are (for future reference) Bob Dylan, Bruce Springsteen, Tom Waits and Richard Thompson. Three of them are American, and the fourth was playing London's Drury Lane on Remembrance Sunday.

Richard Thompson is a precious talent who should have a National Trust Preservation Order slapped on him immediately. He's a writer of immense talent, a guitarist of distinction and a singer with a soul that Mephistopheles would have skipped the Green Shield stamps to obtain.

He's acquired an almost fanatical following over the years, and on record he has sustained the faith placed in him. But in concert the results have been disappointing — until Sunday.

With the graceful and talented Linda by his side, and a band who incorporated the finer aspects of both Steeleye and Fairport (John Kirkpatrick on accordion and Dave Pegg on bass), it was a gig which ranks as his best ever.

They kicked off with "I Want To See The Bright Lights Tonight" (introduced as "as an old Julie Covington number") which got the near-capacity audience rocking contentedly along: followed by the superb, shanty-like "House Of Cards", the single "Don't Let A Thief Steal Into Your Heart", and the chilling "Strange Affair".

The first real indication that it was going to be a scorcher came with the inclusion of "Genesis Hall", from Fairport's "Unhalfbricking" album, it's one of Thompson's many classic, haunting songs; made all the more poignant by the memories it evoked of the late Sandy Denny.

The band were in excellent form, with Pegg's bass as solid as Gibraltar and Kirkpatrick's accordion enhancing the mood. And Linda was in splendid voice, particularly on the under-rated "Pavanne" and "Died For Love". They also seemed to be enjoying the show as much as the audience, especially during the Cajun "Madame Sutine" and Rick Nelson's "Things You Gave Me". It ended with an extended version of "Layla" (no relation) which showed Thompson as a superb and innovative guitarist.

They came back for two encores: an old Lovin' Spoonful number and a storming "Then He Kissed Me". Apart from the sheer magnificence of the performance, it proved that Thompson isn't afraid of his glittering past and that the once nervous, introverted performer had at last come to terms with himself and his music.

TORCH BAG

With all the burning questions of today, including this and that, and one or two other things.
Man-with-the-Zippo?
CHARLES CHARRED MURRAY

Write to THE BAG, NME, 5-7 Carnaby St., London W1 (and give us all a cheap laugh).

HAVING JUST read Julie Burchill's review of the new Siouxsie and the Banshees album I am a little confused as to the purpose of your paper these days. In almost the whole of the review there seems to be no account given to the quality (or otherwise) of the music.

What we get is crass generalisations: "Start with an instrumental circa 'Warsaw' (which isn't an instrumental anyway). "Instrumentals are as pretentious as shit, I don't care who does them." With a meaningless metaphor the lady writes off a whole genre from Beethoven to Booker T. (and anyone who thinks something like "Green Onions" pretentious needs their heads examined).

It's very well to write people off but what does Julie Burchill really have as an alternative? I can think of a lot of sincere artists who have tried to react against the manipulation of dominant ideologies: Jean Luc Godard springs immediately to mind; he who had the good sense to equate Hollywood cinema in essence with Mosfilm, but there's no possible way anyone can say that something like numéro deux is any less manipulative.

Anyone can pose an "avant garde" as an alternative, but it will only function as such, in relation to the norm, if it were to become the mainstream, as is the case with modern art (El Lissitzky in Bond St.) it perpetrates that which it first attacked, and essentially becomes pure style.

What hurt me most is that Ms. Burchill makes her specious criticism sound so self-righteous. There is of course the alternative solution that the whole thing is a pose, which the final sentence seems to suggest. If this is the case she has fooled me, herself and The Sunday Times (God save us). Personally I think the album is dull, but I don't think it's any excuse for such pointless vitriol. Like someone more famous than even J.B. said: "Elle a fait kaka dans ses culottes."

NIK GOLDWIN, Shelton, Stoke-on-Trent.

While feeling obliged to point out to Ms. B that Chuck Berry cut a whole swathe of instrumentals in his time, I have to line up with Julie on the subject of S and the B's. Still thank you for sharing your perspective with us. — CSM.

May I declare the Siouxsie back-lash open. I think Bitchall starts backlashes on purpose knowing how many people's goats she gets and hoping they write in... The tons of letters against her "criticisms" will keep the boiler going all winter in the NME. DA-DO, SAY-IT-IN-BLOOD. Blackpool. Which boiler did you have in mind? — CSM.

In reply to Anna (who actually does live in the real world) who asked "Whatever happened to the good old days of the Roxy and the Vortex?" I'll tell you — punks in their apathy destroyed it. The Roxy was closed down. What did punks do? Nothing. The 100 Club banned new wave gigs 'cos of the poseurs who saw fit to cause violence at the gigs they did stage, and Anna herself proves it. If she objects to the Buzzcocks

(who stopped being a punk band further back than I can remember) playing at the Hammersmith Odeon, then why pay the £2.50 to see 'em! A short while ago I saw the Jets/Resistors and Poser (three virtually unknown bands) in Luton for 80p (not one of the bands actually got paid for the gig) they were doing 'em coz Luton is a dead place, and they wanted to liven things up, and there were about 50 punks there, too. And on the day of writing this letter I'm going to see another local band, Five Year Plan, for only 10p!

That is punk rock. The answer to your question, Anna, is yes — some people do care but it certainly isn't the Buzzcocks, Banshees or Penetration. KEITH, Luton. Or me (yawn). I'm still stuck in '78 burning with boredom — HIDEOUS BILL. DINOSAUR. 'Ang on — Buzzcock Steve Diggle cared enough to send us this — CSM.

Picture this... a group leaves a stage, hoping to return. Roadies mill around, adjusting mikes, as roadies will. Immediately, one gets a can in the balls. The others retreat under a shower of glass. Sadly, the group decides not to return for an encore. Is this reasonable? One might think so.

As to Brighton, we told some kids that we doubt the Top Rank would host another 'Cocks gig, but never mentioned the town itself. We still enjoy it there, and had enjoyed some of the gig in question. I would have liked to do an encore, but such decisions are made collectively, with more than the group having an option.

Our "legendary" uncaring attitude, seems to me largely mythical — the stuff dreams are made. We've been caring a lot longer than I care to remember — and we've learnt more than we could ever forget. STEVE DIGGLE, BUZZCOCKS, Manchester. Thank you, Steve. What for, we're not sure, but thanks — CSM.

The Clash backlash (non journalist section) part 53.

The Clash care about their fans, eh? You really believe all the university gigs on their tour are going to be open to the public? You do? You poor misguided fool!! Just try buying tickets for their two gigs at Strathclyde University and see how lucky you are. Strathclyde University are only selling tickets to students and even then they're only giving out one per person, so no-one gets signed in!

How does that feel, then? So you bought "White Riot" as soon as it was released, so you travelled through to Edinburgh to see them on the White Riot Tour because they didn't have a Glasgow gig, so you rushed out to buy the first album so you could have all those wonderful trax plus Capital Radio, so the Clash mean more to you than any other band in the world — big deal, if you ain't a student you ain't getting in! The worst of all is (according to the university) the Clash know that their "open to the general public" policy isn't being adhered to. Doesn't that feel good?

Well, we're not going to take it! When the Clash arrive at Strathclyde to set up their gear, they'll find at least 38 (so far) ex-Clash fans out in the street burning lots of lovely copies of "White Riot" in rare pic sleeves, lots of lovely copies of very rare "Capital Radio" EPs and lots of expensive albums. To sell or give them away would only fool other people into believing the Clash's lies. We also intend to stop the Clash from getting inside the hall. If we can't see them then all you students aren't going to see them either — sorry but that's the way it goes.

Goodbye Paul, Joe, Mick and Topper. You gave us a few nice dreams but you don't need us any more so we'll try and pretend that we don't need you.

THE GLASGOW PUNK. And the Clash are entitled to go straight through you to play their gig, I hope Strummer Et Cie have a good one too, fool. — CSM.

If Jimmy Pursey wants me to think for myself, why does he never stop preaching? If Sham 69 are a punk band why can't punks go to see them live without risking death at the hands (or feet) of the moronic skinhead "Sham Army"? The juvenile "Hurry Up Harry" is a disgrace to the new wave — Sham 69 have taken over where Gary Glitter left off. Come back Slade, all is forgiven.

PASCOE SELLANBY, Ealing. Fanx — NODDY, BIG EARS AND THE OTHER TWO.

Read your letters page last week. Is this the start of the NME backlash?

THE SARDOE TWINS, Bristol. Definitely, kids. Definitely. — SNOODS, MONOTONY MAKER AND THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

I sent this letter to the Sunday Times, and they didn't print it. SIMON LOFT, Louth, Lincs. Neither will we, so there — CSM.

Don't forget to omit the Doctors of Madness from NME Book Of Modern Music, just as a special tribute like. DE-CONDITION, Ellesmere Port, Merseyside. Woowoooooops... almost blew it. Dump the Doctors' entry sharpish — CSM.

I love your publication. I think it provides an accurate and concise view of the musical scene, cleverly analysing the historic importance and long term relevance of each and every musical happening this decade. I would also like to say how much I appreciate the profound air of social conscience and awareness which runs like a thread of dazzling gold throughout the warp and weft of your paper.

Your publication is surely a yardstick by which the aesthetic aspirations of both past and future must be judged. Am I posered? 'POKEY' DOBERMANN, Hon. Sec. Braeside Anarcho-Buddhistssss. In a word, yes — CSM.

We have read last week in the Sunday Times that Tony Parsons — faced his Dr Martens and fired a Camel. We of the Camel's Union have since interviewed the aforesaid camel, who claimed that " — he did not like working for Mr Parsons", and " — found his behaviour uncooperative and boorish." The camel has since found employment elsewhere and consequently no industrial action will be taken. However, I feel it expedient to warn you, any further discrimination against camels will not be treated so lightly in the future.

THE AMALGAMATED UNION OF CAMELS. He got his severance pay in a hump sum, tho' — CSM.

It's 'girls', like Julie Burchill that make me glad to be gay — and it's "hip young gunslingers" like T Parsons that make me wish I wasn't.

NICK. "I wake-up screaming" VILLIERS, London. Confused, aren't you? — CSM.

I've just spent three-quarters of an hour trying to think of something good to write and I've bloody fallen asleep. THE HARLOW HORN. I've just spent 20 seconds trying to think of an answer to that and I've bloody fallen asleep — CSM.

Do you think I'm abnormal wanting to screw Rachel Sweet? THE POGOING HIPPO WITH THE HIGHEST SEX-DRIVE IN THE UK, somewhere in E.12. Nope, but I'd think she was abnormal if she wanted to screw you — CSM.

Far be it for me to criticise your excellent paper but: your Thrills are predictable, your reporters are puffs, your Bag's a mess, you cost too much and your paper's shit.

A. COMPLAINT, Gloucester. Album token winner (batcha wish you'd enclosed your full name and address, ya pillock) — CSM.

I note that "there is not even a question of Beserkley (the Smirks' record company) coughing up" for Simon Minter's legal costs incurred as part of the Smirks Against Travolta Campaign. Whilst my personal feelings about Travolta are that if you ignore him he may hopefully go away I would point out that Simon hasn't asked us to pay his legal fees and that if he dies we will. Many of our artists (particularly the English ones) are constantly getting themselves into trouble of one sort or another and we always help out when asked to do so (for confirmation ask Sean Tyla). As for your remarks concerning our distributors, Polydor, I have to say that they have been in favour of the Campaign since becoming our distributors and even if they hadn't been — tough shit. You're owned by IPC and we certainly don't hold that against you. FRED CANTRELL, Beserkley Records Boss. How nice of you. — CSM.

I'm getting really sick of Tony Parsons' comments on boys who live at home with their mothers. OEDIPUS. I'm bloody sick of it as well — OEDIPUS' MUM. I might be getting a nuclear missile for Christmas. A SOVIET GENERAL, Warsaw. Pointed end down. I hope — CSM.

T-ZERS

SHUTS UP SHOP

Seen 'em open, seen 'em close dept. Covent Garden's Roxy Club displays a sign of the times.

HOLD EVERYTHING! (Those of you who're reading this at work, in class, on the bus or in front of your Mum can hold everything in a quiet and unobtrusive manner so as not to attract undue attention or ridicule.)

Some of the more alert amongst you may have spotted something closely akin to what we in the publishing trade refer to as "a new masthead" nestling chummily atop the staff box at the right-hand side of the page or even in the general environs of our poll coupon. It says "NME" in big black stencil letters and from next week it'll be adorning the top left hand corner of each and every one of our coruscating covers. We went to enormous trouble and expense to get this new masthead together (i.e. we went out and found a designer and then paid him a whole herd of money), so don't go disappointing us by pretending that you don't recognise us when we hit the stands in seven days time.

So why'd we change the masthead, anyway? Simple, Vladimir. We were bored to buggery with the old one...

Less about ourselves, though, and onto the fab snippets about the lives and doings of Rich, Beautiful And Interesting People. "Ang on, we don't know what Tony and Julie have been up to this week so we might as well hand you over to our Dury Desk. Are you there, Reginald? Thank you. When Ian Dury (for it is he) discovered that Warner Brothers, in their infinite wisdom, were intending to dust off and issue "Wotabunch" (a Kilburn And The High Roads album cut several years back for the now-defunct Rafi label), he paused scarcely long enough for a resounding "Oy oy!" before heading ass over to WEA's luxurious corporate-chic offices to discuss the situation with them. Magnanimously enough, Dury offered to re-record all the tracks using The Blockheads as band and to help promote the resulting album which would cost an estimated £5,000 to record. WEA informed him as follows: that "Wotabunch" was expected to sell no more than 25,000 copies and it was therefore not financially viable to lay out five grand for the re-recording thereof. Thus did WEA talk themselves out of a virtual free new album from one of this country's hottest popular music pres figures. Did someone say something about blockheads?...

Still, you don't have to work for a record company to be a trifle aloof on the uptake. Following a spoof rock column in the even spoofer one-off Not The New York Times (put out to capitalise on New York's recently ended and much envied newspaper strike) which suggested that Arista Records were issuing a triple-album of recordings of Parti Smith's brain waves, some of La Smith's more absurd loyalists have actually been attempting to purchase this desirable item. It's a pity it doesn't actually exist, 'cuz then we could strap some of these turkeys down and make them listen to the horrid thing. Still, people actually did listen to Lou Lou's "Metal Machine Music" so there's clearly no accounting for tastes, nowt as queer as folks, etc.

Blackburnballs: on last week's TOTP, Kuddly Kid Jensen chirped "Maybe he's referring to Radio 1's change of frequency" when introducing Elvis the C's "Radio Radio." Sing it again, El: radio is in the hands of BLOCKHEADS.

Pausing only to wonder whether Les McKeown (guns, cars, fired from Rollers for being dirty with women who were attractive to men but not, apparently Derek, Woody and the rest of 'em) has been having negotiations with a certain Malcolm (Legs) McLaren about forming a teenybop/punk coalition band to drive the Rich Kids straight back to Rock Goes To College (whew), we turn to an interview with the aforementioned Legs in Cambridge's Stop Press in which the Talty One talks up a storm on the subject of Keith Richards ("I met Jagger in New York very recently. He's a total poseur, putting on a working class accent. He said that Richards got off because of a huge network of handouts, bribes placed with the right people... I didn't like Jagger") and — natcho — Sid, who apparently rushed off to score his methadone while Nancy was still alive, finding her dead on his return.

Plus of course, the startling information that Steve Jones and Paul Cook were "the real hellraisers" in the Pistols, "putting up at Heathrow and all that stuff" (waitasec, we thought the official line was that no-one puked up at Heathrow), and even that Linda Blair (of Exorcist fame and not much else) was another of the hyperactive Mr Jones' conquests.

You'll be glad to know that The Clash's "Give 'Em Enough Rope" album has been safely released in the States, and that it's identical to the UK edition except that "All The Young Punks" has been mysteriously mistitled on the sleeve. Could it be that CBS US didn't want the word "punk" to put any radio stations off playing the album (Sing it again, Elvis)...

Relations between Virgin Records and J. Lydon's Public Image are believed to be strained, to say the least. Sources close to the band maintain the reception given by Virgin to the group's "First Edition" LP was somewhat icy. Considering the iconoclastic nature of the record — an hilariously surreal disco track, for example, is intended as the next single — this is perhaps hardly surprising; it would seem that even a 'hip' record company like Virgin finds a cut like "Religion" too close for comfort.

Anyways, the "First Edition" album is comprised of just five lengthy tracks including an extended version of the "Public Image" 45, and will be released on December 6. After abortive sessions at Virgin's Manor and Shepherds Bush studios the record was made in Wardour Street at a studio which usually specialises in reggae recordings.

Further wrangling is said to have broken between PIL and Virgin over the Public Image Christmas Rainbow gigs. Lydon is said to have insisted that Virgin's £175 for tickets be returned to the label with the suggestion that they queue at the box office instead. The band are also believed to be totally dissatisfied with the lack of promotion given by Virgin to the "Public Image" single.

On a more humorous note, 7-Zers understands that there are McLaren-esque plans underfoot to carry out the ultimate rock'n'roll exploitation scam by capitalising on the Sid Vicious murder trial to such an extent that Sid's worldwide stardom will totally surpass that ever conceived of for the Pistols. This, of course, depends on Sid walking out of the courtroom a free man. For reasons which escape us, that is now considered to be the most likely result.

Speaking of El Sid (as indeed, everybody seems to be these days), Herr Vicious has been seen at loads and loads of New York gigs since he got bailed out, most notably Blondie's homecoming bash. He was arm in arm with a young lady described by an observer as "an inveterate local groupie", while — on stage — Robert Fripp jammed with Debbie's Delites on encores of "Heroes", Iggy's "Sister Midnight" and Bolan's "Get It On." Meanwhile, film-maker Amos Poe is planning to star Debbie Dool in a remake of Jean-Luc Godard's Alphaville

Some London records shops, incidentally, are well surprised by the way The Cars' single is ploughing up the charts, since nearly all prospective customers are refusing to purchase unless they get a limited edition (translation: however many the market will stand) picture disc pressing. Seems that some stores are worried about getting stuck with lots of orthodox black copies, but this is no source of worry to the Car at the head of the motorcade, singer Ric Ocasek, who had his Car (no jokes, please) broken into Wednesday before last while he was doing whatever people do at Dingwalls. Ric was relieved of his money, keys, credit cards, wooden leg etc. but most important of all, he was robbed of all the material for the next Cars album. Stool pigeons contact WEA Press Office (01 434 3232) or Kelley MacPherson (01 487 5303) or watch out for any band that's suddenly started playing a bunch of crappy new songs.

And welcome to the wonderful world of bankruptcy: Steve Ellis, ex-lead singer of the Love Affair and more recently of Widowmaker, went bust in Brighton last week with debts of £42,000, while on a slightly grander scale, Marvin Gaye did much the same thing in California with personal debts of over $2,000,000 and business debts to the tune of $1,800,000.

Sheffield's Gang Of Four rejected a Virgin offer of a contract for 8 albums over 5 years with a £25,000 advance. Other companies still a-wooing, while Throbbing Gristle are readying their Christmas album "D.O.A." ("Dead On Arrival"), which features the "United" single speeded up to last about ten seconds, plus computer tapes, conversations and solo tracks from each of the band (sounds like a whole gang of laughs). Meanwhile, Genesis P. Orridge has apparently given permission for their limited edition first album to be bootlegged. Island will not be releasing Burning Spear's "Marcus Children" LP (currently available on pre-release at £4.50) until January, by which time it will have been rattled "Social Living" and will retail at £4.99.

Finally, in the week that a few hundred silly cultists off themselves in a Guyanese jungle for no particular reason, when dozens of deranged women lay quietly smouldering in high streets up and down the country, when the nation's attention is focused on a pretty tacky court case in Minehead, the Big News of the week is that vivacious blond Paul Cook, 22 has been acquitted in Knightsbridge Crown Court, London, of damaging a bus (viz chucking seats out of the top deck windows) because of "lack of identification". Justice has been done, screams T-Zers as it rushes out the door to warm its hands over Julie Burchill, who has just spontaneously combusted and is blazing away merrily up the other end of Carnaby Street...
