NEWS

Cooper Clarke TOURING BACK TO HAPPINESS

THE FIRST 16 dates were announced this week for the late autumn tour by John Cooper Clarke, plans for which were revealed by NME last week. And to tie in with the outing, he has a new single issued by Epic on November 2 — the A-side is a double groove featuring 'Split' and 'Twat', and the coupling is a new number called 'Sleepwalk' from his upcoming LP. 'Twat' is a live track recorded at London Marquee, while 'Split' is a joke version of the same number.

Supported by Chris Sievey & The Freshies and The Out, he plays Coventry Warwick University (November 15), Sheffield Polytechnic (16), York University (17), Newcastle University (21), Hull Wellington Club (22), Canterbury Kent University (24), London Victoria The Venue (25), Southampton University (26), London Twickenham Richmond College (29), Oxford Polytechnic (30), Nottingham University (December 1), London Strand Kings College (3), Liverpool Polytechnic (5), Manchester Polytechnic (6), Birmingham Polytechnic (7) and Wolverhampton Polytechnic (8). More dates are being set and will be announced shortly.

● Pictured left are (above) a detail from the sleeve of J.C.C.'s new single which he drew himself; and (below) the lad in person.

Calling Heads

THE FIRST NINE dates have now been confirmed for the late autumn tour by The Talking Heads, plans for which were exclusively revealed by NME last week. Although they appeared in the Edinburgh Rock Festival eight weeks ago, and played a one-off London show last year, this will be their first UK tour since January, 1977 — and their first ever in which they have headlined at major British theatre venues.

Dates set so far are Leicester De Montfort Hall (November 26), Newcastle City Hall (27), Aberdeen Capitol (28), Edinburgh Odeon (28), Manchester Free Trade Hall (December 1), Birmingham Odeon (2), Hammersmith Pavilion (3), London Hammersmith Palais (4) and Portsmouth Locarno (6).

Promoters Straight Music say that at least two more gigs are being finalised, with details to follow in a week or two. Meanwhile, tickets are on sale now for the first nine shows — prices are £3 and £2.50 (Leicester); £3 only (Hemel Hempstead, Hammersmith and Portsmouth); and £3.50, £3, £2.50 and £2 (elsewhere).

The band released their third LP 'Fear Of Music' last month, and their new single 'Life During Wartime' two weeks ago, and these will be heavily featured in their new stage act.

SIOUXSIE IN DOCK

SIOUXSIE of The Banshees was taken to hospital after the band's concert at Hammersmith Odeon on Monday of last week — the final date of their tour. She had been suffering from stomach and throat disorders for a fortnight, resulting in the cancellation of a couple of gigs. Doctors diagnosed hepatitis, and have ordered complete rest for two months. This means that the cancelled dates cannot now be re-set until the New Year.

● THE LURKERS have landed a residency at London Marquee Club every Wednesday next month — that's November 7, 14, 21 and 28, supported by The Carpettes. The season marks the November 9 release of their new Beggars Banquet single 'A New Guitar In Town', as well as the arrival of Honest John who's joined the band from The Boys for the time being. They're also doing a supposedly secret gig at London Fulham Greyhound on November 17, under the name of The Piss Artists.

● THE CHORDS are being lined up for a full UK tour in December, but meanwhile they play occasional gigs at Portsmouth Polytechnic (this Saturday), York University (November 2), London Marquee (19) and Birmingham University (30).

It's time for action from Secret Affair

SECRET AFFAIR have so far confirmed 26 dates in an extensive autumn tour, including a major London date at the Rainbow — and there are still more being finalised. They'll be featuring their new single 'Let Your Heart Dance', issued by I-Spy this weekend, as well as material from their upcoming album — which is still untitled, but will hopefully be ready for release during the tour. Their additional new member, saxist Dave Winthrop, will be going on the road with them for the first time — and, not surprisingly, the outing has been dubbed 'The I-Spy Dancing In The Street Tour'.

Promoted by Cowbell, the itinerary to date comprises Coventry Tiffany's (November 15), Cambridge Corn Exchange (16), Reading University (17), Birmingham Top Rank (18), Wakefield Unity Hall (19), Bradford University

(21), Lincoln Drill Hall (22), Newcastle Polytechnic (23), Manchester University (24), Wolverhampton Civic Hall (26), Leicester University (27), Liverpool University (28), Aberdeen University (30), Dundee University (December 1), Glasgow Tiffany's (2), Edinburgh Tiffany's (3), Ayr Pavilion (4), Colchester Essex University (6), Canterbury Odeon (7), London Rainbow (8), Bristol Locarno (9), Bournemouth Village Bowl (10), Exeter Routes (11), Shrewsbury Music Hall (12), Guildford Civic Hall (13) and Cromer West Runton Pavilion (14).

● Support act on all dates is Squire who, prior to the tour, have their own dates at London Marquee (this Saturday), Wolverhampton Poly (October 31), Portsmouth Poly (November 1), Dudley J.B.'s (2), Bradford Palm Cove (3), Huddersfield Coach House (4), Dundee Teazars (5), Aberdeen Ruffles (8), Glasgow Technical College (17), Hull Wellington Club (8), Nottingham Sandpiper (9), Rhyl Town Hall (10) and London Camden Music Machine (13).

Stranglers Xmas bonus

THE STRANGLERS, despite their current involvement in a nationwide tour, are already getting geared up for the forthcoming festive season. Not only are they bringing out a special Christmas EP next month, but they are also organising their own all-nighter gala to be staged in London during the holiday period.

Details of the London concert are still sparse, as the band are playing it close to their chests. But they're lining it up themselves, so they can choose their own guests — and one of these is likely to be a big U.S. act with whom Hugh Cornwell was recently involved on his solo album (Thinks: Devo?). They say it will be a contrasting bill, running from late night to breakfast time, and not at one of the "regular" West End venues. And it's expected to take place over the weekend immediately prior to Christmas.

The EP, released by Liberty-United on November 9 in a picture sleeve, is also a contrasting bag. The tracks are (1) the near-acoustic, anti-narcotic 'Don't Bring Harry' from their current hit album; (2) 'Wired' from Cornwell's upcoming solo LP; (3) a live version of 'In The Shadows', recorded by the band at London's Hope & Anchor back in 1977; and (4) Jean Jacques Burnel's 'Crabs', recorded live at Hemel Hempstead Pavilion during his solo tour earlier this year.

● Release of Cornwell's solo single 'White Room' is put back a week, and it now comes out tomorrow (Friday). His album 'Nosferatu' is also delayed a week until November 16.

Rise of The Fall

MANCHESTER band The Fall have their second album released by Step Forward Records this weekend, titled 'Dragonet', and they're going out on an extensive tour to promote it. With more gigs still to come, those confirmed so far are:

Leeds Fan Club (tonight, Thursday), Scarborough Penthouse (Friday), Doncaster Bircotes Leisure Centre (Saturday), Bradford Palm Grove Club (November 1), Newport The Village (2), Dudley J.B.'s (3), Middlesbrough Rock Garden (4), London School of Economics (7), Liverpool Eric's (8), Stockport venue to be set (9), two shows at Blackpool Norbreck Castle (10), Preston Polytechnic (12), Norwich Cromwells (13), Shrewsbury Cascade (14), Retford Porterhouse (16), Brighton Polytechnic (17) and London Marquee (20).

The band say they regret not fixing any dates in Scotland — apparently their agent tried to do so, but all his efforts were frustrated — and they promise to play there at the earliest opportunity. The Fall begin their first American tour on November 26, a two-week coast-to-coast schedule.

● SLAUGHTER & THE DOGS have pulled out of their guest spot in the upcoming Damned tour, starting November 22. They've decided instead to play their own dates next month, to promote their new single 'You're Ready Now', for November 9 release by DJM.

PENETRATION, MADNESS IN

Electric Ballroom specials

MADNESS, who leave their package tour with The Specials and The Selecter on November 15, headline the following two nights in their own right at London Camden Electric Ballroom (16-17), supported by The Beat.

PENETRATION, who last week announced their decision to split, will play the final date of what's supposed to be their farewell tour on November 3 at the Electric Ballroom, supported by Orchestral Manoeuvres In The Dark and Local Operator. And it now looks as though the outfit will not disband totally, but will continue after drastic personnel changes.

CHELSEA also headline at the same venue — their date is November 9, and The Psychedelic Furs are set for the next day (10) supported by A Teardrop Explodes. Among other bookings already reported are the R&B extravaganza topped by The Inmates (tomorrow, Friday) and the Gang Of Four (November 23 and 24).

Promoters Straight Music say that several surprises, including at least two U.S. acts, are being lined up for December. Admission price for all gigs at the ballroom is a standard £2.50, except for some special events when it increases to £3.

and stars at Venue

STEEL PULSE play a three-night season at London Victoria The Venue (November 12-14) to promote their new Island album 'Tribute To The Martyrs'. Tickets are £3 in advance, £3.25 on the doors.

SOUTHSIDE JOHNNY and The Asbury Jukes pay a return visit to The Venue this Sunday (15), and John Hiatt — who is supporting them on their UK tour — has his own show there on November 1.

Other newly-confirmed bookings include The Albion Band (November 6), Grateful Dead lyricist Robert Hunter (7), Charlie Dore's Back Pocket (8), Rocket 88 with Alexis Korner and Charlie Watts (9) and Roger Chapman & The Shortlist (10).

Among acts being negotiated for later next month are Maria Muldaur, Maddy Prior, Ben E. King, The Movies, John Martyn and UK — details to follow after they've put pen to paper. The Ohio Players pulled out of their Venue appearance last weekend at short notice, giving no reason for the let-down.

● The Merion Parkes have pulled out of their Venue gig, originally set for last night (Wednesday) and then rearranged for next Monday (29). Instead, they will now play London Kensington Nashville on November 6.

WHO PLAY THREE IN NOVEMBER — with buskers and food for the wait at the box-office

THE WHO, previously reported as planning some British concerts next month as a warm-up for their forthcoming American tour, have now decided to play just three dates — at Brighton Centre (November 10 and 11) and Stafford Bingley Hall (16). These are expected to be their last UK gigs this year, as their original plan to play some pre-Christmas concerts here seems to have been dropped.

The Stafford gig was deliberately kept low-key to prevent "outsiders" causing ticket chaos — in fact, locals started queuing 40 hours before the box-office opened last weekend, and the show is now sold out. But for the Brighton dates, tickets (£5, £4 and £3) go on sale on Sunday, November 4, and refreshments and live entertainment is being provided for the queue — which will be completely under cover within the Centre's complex. The promoters say it will make "a pleasant day out by the sea".

RANDY NEWMAN IN CONCERT

One-off show by Hunter & Ronson

THE IAN HUNTER BAND, featuring Mick Ronson, fly into Britain to headline a one-off concert at the Hammersmith Odeon on Thursday, November 22 — tickets are on sale now priced £3.50, £5, £2.50 and £2. Hunter is bringing over his full seven-piece band which, besides guitarist Ronson, also includes Tom Mandel and George Mayer (both on keyboards), Tom Morrongiello (guitar), Martin Briley (bass) and Eric Parker (drums). They are just completing an extensive U.S. tour, winding up with three nights at Los Angeles Roxy, which will be recorded for Chrysalis release as a live album in January — and the London concert will also be recorded for possible inclusion.

RANDY NEWMAN is also coming in for a solitary London gig, which will be his only UK date in a brief European tour. It's at the Dominion Theatre in Tottenham Court Road on Sunday, November 25, and he'll be featuring material from his recently released album 'Born Again', backed by a four-piece band. There are two shows at 8 and 9pm, and ticket prices are £5, £4 and £3 (postal bookings only for the time being).

John Ellis solo

JOHN ELLIS — best known for his association with The Vibrators, though he's also played with Snivelling Shits and Euroman — has a single titled 'Babies in Jars' issued early next month. It was recorded live with Rapid Eye Movement, and is the first release on a new independent label Rat Race Records. Ellis is currently busy putting a new band together, and intends to play a number of dates during November. Details of his line-up and itinerary are expected shortly.

Lizzy plan Xmas gala

THIN LIZZY intend to play a special one-off Christmas concert, and are at present trying to make a choice between three or four possible venues, although it's understood that the show will not be in London. The concert will serve two purposes — it will act as a prelude to their upcoming extensive New Year tour, and it will introduce their permanent new guitarist (Gary Moore's replacement) who has not yet been named.

WINGS are preparing for their UK stage comeback, which could well be before Christmas, although their spokesman refused to be drawn on the subject. He commented: "Wings are basically a touring band, and they'll be back on the road sooner or later."

Wild Horses on a canter

WILD HORSES, the band fronted by Brian Robertson and Jimmy Bain, have signed with EMI International who release their debut single 'Criminal Tendencies' on November 2.

They're playing a series of dates to promote it, the first ten confirmed being at Peterborough Warring Stadium (November 2), Manchester University (3), Nadder Coatham Bowl (4), Cleethorpes Winter Gardens (5), Worthingham Boat Club (10), Hunter Victoria Hall (12), Dundee University (18), Lincoln Drill Hall (20), Uxbridge Brunel University (23) and Bedford Corn Exchange (30).

Other gigs, including a major London concert, are being finalised and will be announced shortly. In December, they start recording their first album for February release.

INNES GOING OUT

NEIL INNES goes out on the road next month, to mark his signing with Polydor, and the release of his first album for that label. Titled 'The Innes Book of Records', it's due out early next month, and is a collection of songs from his second BBC-TV series of the same name to be screened next spring. (Incidentally, his first series is due to be repeated over the Christmas period).

His tour dates, including two major London concerts, are Newcastle Polytechnic (November 14), Leicester University (20), Southampton University (21), Bath University (22), Manchester UMIST (23), Sheffield University (24), Cambridge Lady Witches Hall (28), London Victoria Theatre (27 and 28), Guildford Surrey University (29), Bradford University (December 1) and London Kensington Queen Elizabeth College (7). More are likely to be added.

LONDON DATE FOR HACKETT

STEVE HACKETT, who opened his second British tour of 1979 earlier this week, has now slotted a major London date into his itinerary. It's at Drury Lane Theatre Royal on Sunday, November 11, and is promoted by John Martin in association with Capitol Radio, who'll be recording it for subsequent broadcast. As a result, Poole Arts Centre — originally planned for that date — is now cancelled.

Record News

PURSEY PUTS PEN TO PACT

JIMMY PURSEY has signed a solo deal with Polydor and, at the same time, extended his Sham 69 contract with the company. He thus has the best of both worlds, being able to record either with Sham or with other musicians of his choice. Polydor A&R chief Jim Cook reckons Pursey will emerge as one of the biggest stars of the next decade.

JAM'S ALBUM DUE IN THREE WEEKS

THE JAM's fourth album is now officially titled 'Setting Sons', and it's scheduled for Polydor release on November 16, four days before they begin their nationwide tour. The tracks are Girls On The Phone, Thick As Thieves, Private Hell, Little Boy Soldiers, Wasteland, Burning Sky, Smithers-Jones, Saturday Kids, The Eton Rifles and Heat Wave. All are Paul Weller compositions, except 'Smithers-Jones' (by Bruce Foxton) and the Holland-Dozier-Holland standard 'Heat Wave'.

A hot reggae import album titled 'Evolutionary Rockers' by Mickey Dread, one of Jamaica's leading disc-jockeys, has been picked up for the UK by Trojan who'll be releasing it next month re-named 'Dread At The Controls'. The label is also bringing over Dread to promote it, and this will be his first-ever visit to Britain.

Wire have a new single out this weekend on Harvest titled 'Map Reference', taken from their current album '154'. The band are currently setting up some special London dates, and these will be announced shortly.

KK Heino — who, as part of Marshall Main had a smash hit single last year with 'Dancing In The City' — releases a solo single this week on Harvest titled 'The Joke's On You'. It's taken from her album 'Uninvited Guests' due out in the New Year.

Numan latest

GARY NUMAN's follow-up to his chart-topping 'Cars' is set for November 16 release by Beggars Banquet — it's a track from his hit album 'The Pleasure Principle' called 'Complex'. The B-side is a live version of 'Bombers' (originally issued as his second single) recorded at one of his recent Hammersmith concerts.

These are THE VAPORS, a Guildford-based band newly signed by Liberty-United. And the reason they're posing so truculently is that their first single 'Prisoners' is less than this weekend. What's more, they've landed another big break by being signed as support act on the UK tour by The Jam, starting next month. Prior to that, they can be seen in action at London Camden Music Machine (tomorrow, Friday) and Farnborough Tumbledown Dicks (November 8).

Detroit-based band Destroy All Monsters, who've just completed their debut UK tour, have a new single issued this week by Cherry Red Records. Titles are 'Nobody Knows' and 'What Do I Get'.

Goldie, who scored a Top Ten hit last year with 'Making Up My Mind', have their first single for 11 months issued by Bronze this weekend — titled 'How Many Times'. Out on the same label is 'Pure Magic' by The Realistics.

Barbra Streisand's new album, issued by CBS on November 8, is called 'Wet' — with all the songs relating to rain, tears and other damp phenomena! The title song also appears at the B-side of the 12-inch Streisand-Donna Summer duet 'No More Tears' which, as reported last week, comes out on November 2.

Erol Duzluker, currently figuring strongly with his Scope single 'OK Fred', has another single issued by Arzak this week — titled 'Little Way Different', it's in both 7" and 12" versions.

Barrie Wonder's long-awaited double album 'Journey Through The Secret Life Of Plants', about which much has been written in recent weeks, at last has an official release date — Friday, November 2, on the Motown label.

Feelgoods let it roll

DR. FEELGOOD, currently undertaking a six-week European tour, return home next month and immediately set out a massive 26-date UK schedule — taking them right up to Christmas weekend. As a prelude to their outing, the band's new album 'Let It Roll' — containing ten new tracks — is released by Liberty-United on November 9, preceded this weekend by a single titled 'Put Him Out Of Your Mind'. The Feelgoods' itinerary includes a major London Christmas concert, and the date sheet comprises:

Cardiff University (November 20), Dublin Olympic Stadium (22), Belfast Queen's University (23), Manchester Apollo (25), Edinburgh Tiffany's (26), Glasgow Apollo (27), Newcastle City Hall (28), Hull City Hall (29), Aberystwyth Pavilion (30), Birmingham Odeon (December 1), Leicester De Montfort Hall (2), Oxford New Theatre (3), Sheffield University (4), Bradford University (5), Southampton University (6), Norwich East Anglia University (7), Nottingham University (8), Redcar Coatham Bowl (9), Lancaster University

BIG PRE-XMAS TOUR

(10), Colchester Essex University (12), Cromer West Runton Pavilion (15), Dunstable Civic Hall (16), London Hammersmith Odeon (19), Canvey Island Paddocks (20), Cambridge Corn Exchange (21) and Melvern Winter Gardens (22).

ROD: TV & ELPEE, BUT NO GIGS YET

ROD STEWART has delayed his next UK appearances still further, and is not now expected to perform here until next summer, when he'll be playing several large concerts in Britain as part of a European tour to promote his new album — which he'll be recording in Los Angeles after Christmas. He will, however, be based here until the end of the year, and will be making several major TV appearances to promote his 'Greatest Hits' LP — which, as previously reported, is released by Riva on November 2.

Titles on the album — all Top Five entries when originally issued, and all Gold Disc winners — are Hot Legs, Maggie May, De Ya Think I'm Sexy?, You're In My Heart, Sailing, I Don't Want To Talk About It, Tonight's The Night, The Killing of George (Parts 1 & 2), First Cut Is The Deepest and I Was Only Joking. Four of the tracks — 'Maggie May', 'Sailing', 'Tonight's The Night' and 'I Don't Want To Talk About It' — have been specially remixed for the LP, which is to be the subject of the most intensive advertising campaign Riva have ever mounted.

AFTER THE FIRE, NOW COMES THE RAINBOW

AFTER THE FIRE play the most important concert of their career so far, as the climax of their 45-date tour which has kept them on the road for two months. It's a headliner at London Rainbow on November 17, with The Passengers and one other act supporting — tickets priced £2.50, £2 and £1.50 go on sale tomorrow (Friday). Other newly confirmed tour dates are Belfast Queen's University (tonight, Thursday), Dublin Trinity College (Friday), Cork University (Saturday), Newcastle University (November 1), Birmingham Top Rank (11) and Reading University (16). Their Pontypridd Polytechnic gig is brought forward from November 8 to 5.

Landscape's UK designs

LANDSCAPE, who signed with RCA earlier this year, have their first album out this week — with their name as its title. And they're going out on tour to promote the LP, with dates so far confirmed at Bristol Polytechnic (this Saturday), Newbridge Memorial Hall (Sunday), Norwich Samson & Hercules (November 1), Leeds Florde Green Hotel (3), Leicester Phoenix Theatre (4), London School of African & Oriental Studies (8), Wolverhampton Polytechnic (10), Dudley JB's (17), Liverpool Eric's (22), London City Polytechnic (23), London Battersea Arts Centre (24), Middlesbrough Teesside Polytechnic (27) and Edinburgh Astoria (28 and 29). They can also be seen in BBC2's 'Old Grey Whistle Test' next Tuesday (30).

News Round-up

● THE TEMBEATS have set further dates to tie in with the upcoming release of their second Safari Records single 'Strength Of The Nation'. They include London Covent Garden Rock Garden (this Sunday), London The Venue (next Monday), Weybridge National College of Food (November 2), Manchester University (7), Manchester Mayflower (9), Redditch Tracey's (14) and Nottingham Sandpiper (24).

● MIKE WESTBROOK BRASS BAND stage a one-off performance of their unique jazz-rock cabaret 'Mama Chicago' at London Chalk Farm Roundhouse on Friday, November 2 (tickets £2.25 to £3.75). And next week, RCA release the double album recording of this work.

● UK SUBS have been booked for their first American tour, starting at Hurrah's in New York on November 25, and playing a total of 25 dates through to the end of December. To preface their visit, their UK hit 'Tomorrow's Girls' is issued in the States this week. Back in Britain, the band's movie 'Punk Can Take It' is being shown in selected cinemas as support to 'Scum'.

● THE PIRATES have added another five dates to their current tour — at Reading University (November 7), Durham St. Cuthbert's College (9), London Kensington Nashville (16 and 17) and London Islington Hope & Anchor (20). Their double A-side single 'Lady Put The Light On Me' / 'Lamonde' is released by Cube on November 2.

● PURSEY'S PACKAGE will not now be playing London Nashville this Friday and Saturday (28-29), following a police raid last weekend, which means that the venue is now 'playing it cool' for the time being. They are replaced by The School Bullies, an alias for a well-known act.

● GANG OF FOUR have made a few changes to their tour, reported three weeks ago. They have new bookings at Middlesbrough Rock Garden (November 18), Manchester Polytechnic (20) and Bournemouth Town Hall (22); Reading University moves from November 5 to 13; and Oxford Polytechnic (November 9), Bristol Locarno (11) and Manchester Factory (December 1) are cancelled.

● PUNISHMENT OF LUXURY have cancelled their appearance at London Marquee Club on October 30, and The Piranhas have been booked to replace them. But they have added Sheffield Ilmk Club (November 11) to their tour schedule.

● THE SPECIALS package, also featuring Madness and The Selecter, will play Lancaster University after all, it was originally announced as November 1, but cancelled in favour of Manchester Apollo, and it's now been re-set for November 2.

ANOTHER FIVE MILES AHEAD

JOHN MILES has added five dates to his UK tour reported two weeks ago — at Hemel Hempstead Pavilion (November 18), Redcar Coatham Bowl (25), Hull City Hall (26) and Birkenhead Hamilton Club (29). His gig on November 16 is changed from Salford University to Manchester Maxwell Hall, and on November 19 he now plays London Imperial College instead of Bournemouth Winter Gardens. And Sheffield University is brought forward one day to November 30. A new Miles single 'Don't Give Me Your Sympathy' is issued by Decca on November 9.

By NICK KENT

APPROXIMATELY a month ago, lurching down towards the Covent Garden area of Central London, this journalist observed one Steve Jones, well-known beefcake boy and Sex Pistols guitarist. Being old acquaintances on reasonably amenable terms, Jones corralled the scribe in his tracks for a brief tete-a-tete about each other's well-beings, the rising price of pork and life in general.

With the pleasantries laid aside, the journalist immediately recalled that — hold hard, the call of the profession was bleating on the brainplate — his verbal sparring partner had not long before been on the verge of becoming one chunky-sized quarter of a spanking new Sex Pistols line-up with volatile self-styled Cockney cowboy Jimmy "Mighty Mouth" Pursey dumping his former crew Sham 69 to be this hot enterprise's frontman. From a rumour to an official declaration and statement-of-intent, this pairing of self-styled "working class hero" and self-effacing "working class tossers" had blossomed, replete even with pop weekly front cover snapshots of the planned unit, all grins and generally "oy-oying" it up for the lensmen.

The final Sham gigs had been performed — with Jones and Cook in tow for a showcase spot "of things to come", not to mention reports of some studio recording.

Then suddenly it fell to pieces like a house of cards. Not even with yer typical Pistols bang but more of a whimper, with the only "official" statement coming from the verbally inclined Mr Pursey who apparently "woke up one morning and thought 'Ere, I'm not a Sex Pistol'."

Realising that neither Jones nor Cook had ever said anything about this mysterious break-up, I asked the guitarist for a brusque reason-why.

Jones, scratching his chin, pondered the query for a second, then with a typical look of slightly naive earnestness enquired:

"Ere, 'ave you ever met Pursey? ... Well, he's a bit of a div, innit?" — "div" being Jonespeak for dunc, dullard, thicko or brickhead.

It might also be pertinent to state that during the above exchange, the 24-year-old Pistol was wearing a black T-shirt, upon which was loudly embossed a white swastika design, there for all passers-by to see. The above conversation also just happened to take place at an approx. 200 yards distance from a synagogue.

WHEN I really knew somethin' was well wrong was that time in the studio, right. Like, I'd literally just finished writing this set of lyrics — the title was 'Some Play Dirty'. OK, and like I was really, really proud of 'em. The words go:

"The morning draws open the curtains/You're alive to another day/The angry sound of the jungle outside/Cries out 'We need you, boy'/'You turn to face the mirror/Is this the me or you that I knew/Put on the lead they bought you/It's time to go for a walk."

"Then the chorus goes: 'Some play dirty, some play clean/Oh yeah, you know what I mean'."

"Now's the second verse: 'Put on your Sunday best/Monday's overalls don't impress/Your clock card is your punch-line/That's life in my own time.' Then it's back to the chorus again, right."

"Anyway I'm reciting these lyrics in the studio, feeling dead chuffed 'cos they're fuckin' good, I reckon. And whilst I'm reading 'em out, I can see Steve and Paul's faces sorta drop and their eyebrows lower, y'know, and it's like, well it was obvious they couldn't understand them or something."

"That's when I realised we wuz really just on two completely different levels."

A big hi, hello and welcome to the latest NME Jimmy Pursey interview. This week the man they can never silence will talk about his abortive stab at becoming a Sex Pistol and why it didn't work, the old Sham 69, the glory days and the glory days, his feelings on drugs, the British working class, Johnny Rotten, the past, present and future of punk and its intertwining with the ongoing Pursey crusade. And that's just for hors d'oeuvres, fact fans!

Interspersed amidst this veritable powerhouse of abrasive verbiage, you'll get some "probing" literary ephemera from yours truly, which will attempt to grant this article a measure of perspective.

You see, we have just a slight problem here. Not, let it be clearly stated, due to the lack of humorous anecdotes from our interviewee (eg Pursey on another reason for not teaming up with the Pistols: "While we wuz down the studios, I looked over at Paul Cook and his face was all crunched up, right, and 'e looked just like a fox! And I thought 'Fucking 'ell, I don't wanna be in a group with a geezer who looks like a fox.'")

Or to lack of candour. Indeed, so candid is

ULCER

The cares Jimmy

our interviewee, he allows an extremely dodgy statement concerning certain personages whom he has worked with, and what he considers fondness for certain 'hard drugs', to be taped for posterity. ("It's not that I'm totally anti-drugs, right. I've 'ad the odd puff of marijuana here and there, but when it gets to where you're gigin', right, and you're in some hotel and next morning you find one of yer band is dead from an overdose, then it sets you thinking.")

Nope, Pursey's no faint heart where candid proclamations are concerned. Indeed, the very fact that he is so effusively verbal, so bloated with fighting talk and frank banter, makes one clock Jimmy Pursey as the sort of lad whose mouth is often not firmly attached to his brain. And there lies the problem.

Of course, I should have known better, simply by recalling the times when the NME headquarters were still centred on the 21st floor of King's Reach Tower near Waterloo Bridge and the clicking of typewriter keys would all too often be muffled by the raucous philosophising of one J Pursey regularly using the office as a platform for his endless manifestoes.

THOSE WERE earlier days for Sham 69 — formerly an R&B band, so the story goes, until Pursey changed the line-up and managed to squeeze his mob of reprobates in just as the door sealing the first flooding of punk bands slammed shut.

Tony Persons wrote a glowing NME review heralding Pursey's "howls of hurt" at working class deprivation, and Jim has never looked back since. "I'll take them all on," proclaimed lionhearted Jim, and the music press chewed it up, spitting it out to a public many of whom — young, confused, restless and looking for a voice as coarse, trash and extravagant as Pursey's to hearken to — were only too willing to enlist in the Sham Army.

And what with the Pistols hardly gigging at all and The Clash soon to face a breakdown in communications with manager Bernie Rhodes plus all manner of attendant grief, Pursey's rabble-rousing filled an empty space in the scene, leaping from Miles Copeland's Step Forward to a lucrative Polydor contract like Tarzan on benzedrine.

Certainly no one could claim Jimmy Pursey didn't — and still doesn't — move fast.

Yet whilst the Sham Army gathered momentum, a distinctly ugly element could be sighted mingling in with the troops. British Movement supporters were noted rallying amid the skinhead legions, whilst the National Front banner-wavers were similarly visible.

With nothing concrete to back up the rabble-rousing, the Sham Army, weaned on Pursey's "I'm just like you" pronouncements, started to turn ugly. Pursey's attempted efforts to define his stance with songs like 'If The Kids Are United', but Sham's gigs appeared to be fast degenerating into riots, with the stage being regularly overtaken by boisterous louts who, having taken Pursey at his word, considered their equality a divine right to make fools of themselves under their band's spotlight.

By the end of last year he was pretty much ready to pack it all in. A mutual friend after a heart-to-heart claimed that Pursey "looks set to top himself the way he's going".

Around that time, I recall encountering Pursey at the Polydor offices. Obviously bearing the strain — he looked and sounded as though he hadn't slept for days — he suddenly turned away from a group of slightly sycophantic Polydor employees offering words of encouragement to ask me: "Ere, do you think you can win in this business?"

"Not really," I replied. He then started to rabbit on about some concept he'd had — for an album, a play, who knows what? — where a nonentity becomes a star, only to be faced by a mirror for an audience. I recall advising him to read some books, see some films, widen his horizons.

"The only two films worth seeing and learning from," he replied somewhat defiantly, "are If and O Lucky Men. All the rest is bollocks."

ASIDE FROM a brief infatuation with the street-gang-violence-as-romantic-conceit image of The Warriors, Jimmy Pursey still appears to adhere to those two Lindsay Anderson films as a dual Bible. In much the same way, he still probably rates John Lennon's Working Class Hero as the only great song ever written — apart from his own work of course.

God knows he has his fair share of denigrators, to whom he appears either as a dangerously naive buffoon both propagating and exploiting tired old British working class clichés or, worse still, an out and out opportunist and egocentric pumping said clichés in a manner that they consider calculating and downright condescending. Johnny Rotten for one has stated words to that effect, whilst others will point out that Pursey is no "Cockney cowboy", but was born in Surrey, a flat old distance from the chimneys of Bow Bells.

On the other side of the fence, Pursey can do no wrong. His supporters consider him to be "for real", the "only honest punk singer left" and (Pursey's favourite) "a modern day Robin Hood".

And in the middle stand a mixed bunch, those who find him a likable rogue — honest but naive, a straight enough bloke, but with a badly focussed view on the issues he's dealing with. You can count me amongst the latter crew of side-liners.

SO TO THE interview — the reason for which was basically to clear up the whole Sex Pistols mess and to declare Sham 69 once more fully operative with only

"Our early songs were working class songs. And who were the working class? They were the poor sods who went over the top in the '14-'18 war..."

drummer Dodie Cain absent from the original line-up (he left to be replaced by ex-Automatics Rick Goldstein). Dave "Kermit" Tregan was also present but was unable to issue forth anything more than the odd mumble or nod in agreement with Pursey's machine-gun bursts of rhetoric.

The Pistols episode was dealt with for starters. Pursey pumps up his gruff voice and lets fly.

"Very honest and truthfully, right, I met 'em and really felt a kinship in the beginning. I wanted to be with 'em 'cos of what was happening with Sham at the time and because I felt that they were the only other group that I could work with and get across what I wanted to get across. I also — and this might sound like bullshit, but it's the truth — wanted to help them prove what amazing musicians they are. 'cos for me the Pistols are probably one of the best rock 'n' roll groups in the world."

"In fact, they were the greatest rebel rock band of all times. No sweat. Not 'cos of Malcolm fucking McLaren, but — like, take Johnny Rotten. Now when I slag the man, it's not 'cos I 'ate him. I slag 'im so's to get him off his arse 'cos I believe the kid got so deep into what he believed in that it destroyed 'im. Just thinking you're two different people can destroy you. Plus his mother dying, which is a shock for any kid to go through. I mean, Christ, I love my mother."

"Same thing with John Lennon. Look how it did 'im in."

"Now, I never wanted to be in the Pistols as another Johnny Rotten. See, what annoys me about Rotten or Lyndon (sic) is — 'ow can I explain it? I can see that there were all these things going on in his head, but I did not want to be a bleeding puppet, which he was up until towards the end when he suddenly realised and started slashing at the strings, saying 'I wanna be me, not Pinocchio'."

"But when he cut the strings off he was struck by this huge fear of what do I do now? It's ironic, I think, that he's the opposite of me there. See, Johnny Rotten and the Pistols were totally fucked up by the outside world. So when both came together — that being me, Paul and Steve — the fact that we both came from bands, both fucked up in totally different opposite ways, made it totally unworkable."

"It was absurd, the difference between us, when we got into the studio. Then I knew it could never work out."

Pursey's observations on this inevitable communications breakdown make for some of his more sharp-witted comments, as the Pistols' insularity — playing only a handful of gigs, plus the looming spectre of Malcolm McLaren — was their undoing, just as Pursey and Sham gave too much of themselves. Fortunately, his thought processes stay sharp when he discusses further his reasons for first considering a Pistols coalition.

"I know people are going to take this the wrong way, but I'll say it just the same 'cos it's true. I wanted to join the Pistols to reach a wider audience. Not the money!"

"And you can check the Sham's past record for giving the punters their money's worth to verify that. Like, who else has given away 23,000 records? Who else has stuck in a free record in their last album? It didn't matter if people think the record's crap. The fact that we're giving it away is what counts, right?"

"And the other thing, I said I'd form a record label. I formed one. I said I'd sign bands that had never been signed before. I've signed these bands. So nobody can put me down for that!"

"'Cos the business as it currently stands and has always stood, stinks. It always comes down to one thing in this business and it's simply this. You've got to lick people's arseholes to get anywhere, in order to benefit others."

"And that's exactly what I've bin doing all the time! I have been humiliating myself 'Record company, you're fantastic', just to get money for groups I believe in, to give it all back to the kids."

"Not like Johnny Rotten, who's 'Fuck you I am an artist, buy my record for eight quid and lick my arse.' He's as bad as Richard 'Tosspot' Branson — and that's the pits, mate!"

"Like, I went there and I saw Virgin Records. And I saw the cotton wool. And I saw a load of greedy bastards and I thought 'There is no way, Jim, that you are gonna get money out of this company to help benefit the kids. These people are just gonna suck me in and blow me out like a fart from their corporate arsehole. And I'm not havin' any part of that.'"

"Like, look at the way they exploited poor old Sid Vicious! People reckon I'm a bleeding Wally and that the Pistols are so cool, but Christ I'd rather be a Wally, who's alive and healthy instead of some so-called Rock 'n' roll hero who's dead! Or some basketcase casualty with all his brain cells and blood spurting all over the walls and ceiling."

"But that's what they call fashionable. That's bleedin' fashion for yer!"

"One thing Sham 69 are absolutely not about is fashion."

THE PRECEDING verbals have been delivered by Pursey in a tone which zig zags wildly from gruff voiced reason to sudden crescendos of unbridled rage, punctuated by a fist punched into a palm or else hammered down on an adjacent table.

"With Sham 69 it's really as simple as this. If you go back to the '60s — which, by the way, everyone keeps doing these days, so much so it's getting' really boring — but we want to be like The Yardbirds or George Fane and the Blue Notes (Flames, actually, Jim, but continue) or like Chris Farlowe or The Animals . . .

"Those are the bands we respect 'cos they didn't fuck around with yer trends and yer ego-trips." (Tell that to anyone who has worked with Jeff Back or Eric Burdon, Jim, and you may well have an argument on your hands. But, again, continue . . .)

"They just got down to the business of pumping it out. See, that's why I wanted to come back as Sham 69. People ask me 'Are you going to change the name?' I said, 'No, no, no, it's going to be Sham 69 or nothing at all.'"

"We don't make records for people to sit around and analyse and discuss the merits of — you know, all that psuedo bollocks! With us, it's simple, straight forwards, rough and ready."

"I believe in instant rock. You go in, bash out the A and B sides — two tracks — in no more than seven hours and that's that. It's what my label was based upon. Just picking a young band who know what they want to sound like and who go in and just knock it down straight off.

"Sometimes, certain groups haven't like the way I work. They come in and want to do it again. And again, I just say no, it has to be instant."

"That's why I lost both The Chords and The Purple Hearts, 'cos they couldn't see eye to eye with my methods. Fair enough, it's their choice."

Again there's a fair quote of good sense, particularly in regard to the matter of wasting studio-time. The only problem — in practice — has been the fact that most of the new bands Pursey has produced — The Angelic Upstarts and Cockney Rejects are fair examples — have ended up sounding one-dimensional with no distinctive sound of their own. In fact more often than not, his outside work has created only even more abrupt-sounding Sham 69 clones with no originality or ingenuity. Just rampant guitars doling out riffs at maximum speed with the singer bellowing out some puerile mock-anthem.

Pursey of course doesn't see it that way.

"I believe in getting the full bottle of a new band when they are young and fresh."

Freshness comes over on the record, if there's freshness in the band. That's how the Stones did it originally, that's how . . . fuck, the '50s . . . you listen to a '50s rock record and it sounds so naive. The geezer on that '50s record probably didn't know shit, but he just wants to fuckin' rock out, let rip and make that record so bad that you can feel the frenzy of him just letting it all pour out. And that's rock and roll, mate!"

Pursey is now marching up and down the room, arms waving, voice braking out his contentions like a drill sergeant giving wake-up call orders. The word naive prompts me to force in a word and ask him whether he considers being regarded naive a blessing or a curse, particularly in such a cut-throat business.

"Fuckin' right I think it's a blessing. Sham 69 is still naive and thank God for that I tell yer, I really consciously try to retain some remnants of my innocence."

"Cos if I lose that, I'll be just like Johnny Golden Bollocks Rotten or the kind of prat John Lennon turned out to be."

"On one level, I really admire them, but when it gets down to that level where a geezer either sells out or keeps his dignity, both of them — and Rotten in particular — just sold out. And I can't forgive that. It's just not on."

John Lydon is one matter but I can't truly understand why or when Pursey thinks John Lennon "sold out." If Lennon has chosen to retire from making rock'n'roll records it's for the simple reason that he feels he has nothing to say — and I'd far prefer the man to remain in dignified silence than to hack out redundant 'pop' that would only impair the volume of powerful work he's created. Certainly, he's not "died for rock'n'roll" like the characters Pursey finds so disdainfully trendy. From all accounts he's very much alive and well. A "Wally" with dignity, no less.

But it's impossible to get into a rap about John Lennon because less than a second after his name has cropped up so, surprisingly, has Tom Robinson's. Pursey is firing up for one of his favourite topics: Jimmy, the working class punk saviour.

"It's one thing yer Tom Robinson preaching to the converted, shouting 'We love the blacks' to a bunch of middle-class students who live in some nice suburban estate. 'Course they'll say 'Right on, Tom' 'cos they don't live right next door to a black family."

"It's quite another matter gettin' up and saying that to a bunch of bruisers down the East End of London or Southall or 'Ounslow. They'd tell 'im bollocks! Piss off!"

"But I did! I just got up and said 'Listen, we've got to. 'Cos if we start doin' it, it'll work. And people ask me, why do you have these skinheads hangin' around at your gigs? 'Because those are the working-class kids who you've got to try and turn on and say 'This is music. This is the message. Try and get into it!'"

IT'S HERE that Pursey and myself probably really start to check out situations differently. His sleg of Tom Robinson is simply incorrect for starters, seeing that Robinson's main platform has been not a class or race issue at all but more an attempt to break through the far more inbred prejudices that exist in this country. The fact that Pursey appears unable to comprehend this and berates Robinson for attempting to purge prejudice, whatever his shortcomings, displays an egotism unpleasantly at odds with his previous statements regarding a community spirit, etc. More specious still is Pursey's belittling of Robinson simply because he is middle-class, thus pinpointing one of punk's most wretched facets — its virtual elitist determination to be a working-class movement.

Pursey still seems to view the British working class en masse as the bully-boys who went over the tranches at Dunkirk over 30

Nashville To Close?

Police Jam With Pretenders

FIGHTING erupted at London's Nashville last Friday at the climax of The Angels Upstarts tour, resulting in 16 people being charged with offences ranging from being drunk and disorderly to threatening behaviour.

The Upstarts hadn't even arrived when the brewing, which started over a game of pool, began. They arrived just before they were due to go on stage and were surprised to find the place closed.

Three of the fifteen people arrested were still in hospital on Monday, their conditions not said to be serious. A policeman who was on the scene at the start of the trouble had a bottle pushed in his face, but the bottle didn't break.

The following night a Pretenders gig at the same venue was halted by a large number of police.

No reason can be ascertained for this turn-out but reports indicate it served to liven up an otherwise average evening.

The Pretenders were playing a warm up gig under the name of Martin Chambers' Big Stick when they were stopped just after 11 o'clock, despite the Nashville having a licence extension till midnight at weekends. People's ages were checked and slips of paper were handed out that had to be signed and handed in on leaving. Pretenders' manager Dave Hill was watching from the wings and wasn't given any reason for this action.

"I only hope they all paid to get in," he shrugged. The management of the Nashville declined to comment about the reasons for the police presence on Saturday, and were also surprised that there should have been trouble on the Friday as the Upstarts previous gigs had gone off peacefully.

The Nashville management also declined to say whether this incident, which may well have prompted the visit the following night, might possibly jeopardize their music licence.

When it was pointed out that NME would be sympathetic to their case, they replied: "We need more than sympathy."

As it seems they do, for magistrate Mr Eric Crowther who on Saturday dealt with many people arrested the previous day later called for an explanation from the Nashville management.

"This is intolerable," he said. "I am not happy with having a large part of my list taken up with the activities of one pub. I propose to make a report to the licensing justices recommending that the licence be withdrawn because of the great deal of underage drinking that goes on there."

Chief Inspector A.J. Burns-Howell added that following the police visit on Saturday proceedings against the parent company were also being considered.

The future of what has long been one of London's premier small venues hangs uneasily in the balance.

Stevie Wonder, In The Conservatory, With The Lead Piping.

WE'RE IN a chartered bus, in Manhattan filled with a large selection of liggers and hanger-outers.

Stevie Wonder has a new album and we are being driven out to a party to give it a listen. It's called 'Journey Through The Secret Life of Plants', and we're off to a location with lots of plants around — the New York Botanical Garden out in the far reaches of the Bronx.

Set the right atmosphere, give us something to write home about. Well, the industry may claim to be in a slump but someone round here has never heard of that. Even before the buses are rolling lovely hostesses are handing out hors d'oeuvres and pouring champagne.

The Botanical Garden was found in 1891 by Nathaniel Lord Britton and was modelled after the Royal Botanical Gardens at Kew. The conservatory is an elaborate design of connecting rooms, each with a different theme, there's an old world desert room, a fern forest room, a palm grove room, and even a lilies of the field room. There's also — tonight only — a food and booze room — and that's where the action is. Hundreds of press, photographers, promotion people and dodgy looking heavies mill about. But what about the album? Someone tells me the sound system isn't working.

Soon it's into a large tent for a buffet dinner and finally the album waits out of a few blown out sounding speakers, not at all audible above the din of conversation and rattling silverware. (Stroke of luck, eh? Thrills Ed.)

Three years in the making, recorded on state-of-the-art digital equipment, debuted with a lavish party, and you can hardly hear a thing!

First then a short introduction from the artist, Stevie Wonder in person. He speaks in a halting, self-consciously mellow voice about the album's inspiration. Couldn't hear him much either but a reference to the programme notes shows the album to be a highly thematic affair, a concept album carried to extremes.

Side one is said to be "a majestic look at the very beginning of the earth as we know it from the volcanic explosive start". It opens with three synthesiser based instrumentals, plodding and unobtrusive. The songs that followed seem like usual Wonder chords coupled with lyrical profundities worthy of Kahlil Gibran. Sample this: "There is a garden where every heart can share in the joy of giving". Get the picture?

Side two is said to contain a "serenade by Pan, mythological god of flowers to the plant world" (Flowers! Small furry animals, moonshine and frolicsome nymphs but not flowers! Thrills Ed.) Thrills suspects the authorship of this piece to be in doubt but Pan was unavailable for comment.

Side three has a lyric in the Bambara language of the Dogon tribe, and another on the subject of being reincarnated as a flower. No expense spared in the search for the exotic.

Side four has a tree instrumental, a song called 'The Secret Life of Plants' and an instrumental finale. I'm not sure how much of this I heard because the dinner revelries were now in full swing. (Look, what's happened to this lead piping? Non-Closed playing Ed.)

After dinner Wonder moves in the crowd led by an assistant, shaking hands and being photographed with everyone. A flunky with two parrots pursues him and Wonder does a lot of posing with the parrots (he has a TV commercial for TDK tapes in which he poses with parrots).

Wonder has dressed like a slick urban Roy Rogers, duded up in a cowboy shirt, when the reviews are in on this he'll be screaming for Trigger. One suspects he's getting some dubious advice from those close to him.

Views that the plants in their conservatory wouldn't like the album and would exercise their critical judgment by withering up proved to be unfounded. But as to how the plants felt about having their secrets revealed — they weren't saying.

Scientology: Sci-Fi Epic.

LRON HUBBARD, the leader of the hard sell religious cult, the Church of Scientology, has launched himself into the motion picture business. Working through an organisation called Brilliant Films, founded for the purpose, Hubbard has sunk some $49 million into a proposed science fiction epic of the Star Wars kind with the working title Revolt of the Stars.

Hubbard, a one time science-fiction novelist, has written the screenplay and will supervise the production from his diesel yacht Apollo. He has lived in semi-seclusion on the yacht since he wrote the best selling Scientology "bible", "Dianetics" and founded the hierarchical, stratified and highly lucrative religion.

As yet no director and no stars have been signed for the picture, but obviously Hollywood speculation centres on Scientology creed.

Brilliant Films insist that they are only affiliated to the church "as a business" but since Scientology has never exactly been tardy in seizing the chance to make new converts, it's unlikely that Hubbard will completely pass up the chance to push his philosophy.

ESKIMO, The Residents' sixth LP represents their most challenging musical concept to date. The album evokes an apocalyptic culture previously struggling to exist in a cold and unforgiving reality. The various tracks on the disc are in the form of stories and songs, an legends and adventures in a classic element of Eskimo life. The tales are told by the sounds of the Eskimo, their music, and their voices. There is no narration, although the narratives are printed on the jacket to encourage the listener to project himself into the cold barren world of whiteness. Ignoring the stories, the album is a master piece of highly abstract music punctuated by primitive rhythms and voices. Without doubt, ESKIMO is one of the strangest, most original concepts available on record today.

Debbie Harry in sexploitation shock!

LOVE SEX, hate sexism? Love play, hate Playboy? Yep, Debbie Harry used to be a Bunny, and since the ageing swingers at Playboy have only just heard of her, they dug out this picture from their files and published it in their November issue in order to titillate decadent members of the bourgeoisie (we're reprinting it purely in the interests of science, of course). In the interview that accompanies said pic, our Deb goes on to describe at great length the wonderful time she had while wearing the ears and tail.

"It's a great job for a girl who wants to make a lot of money," purrs Deb. "If she doesn't know what else to do, I think it's a great company for a woman. I had to work hard and really hustle, but if you stick it out, it's probably one of the few corporations in America where a woman can work her way up."

ADVANCED STUDENTS ONLY: (a) Suggest no less than ten really crappy double entendre jokes which could be extracted from the above quotation and (b) speculate as to whether Playboy would have run the interview if Debbie had in fact said, "Working as a bunny was the most humiliating, disgusting and generally depressing time in my entire life."

Abortion: If you don't play the game, don't make the rules.

AT THIS present session of Parliament a motley group of predominantly male moralists led by John Corrie MP will be attempting to force through a bill which would effectively cut by two-thirds the number of abortions available on the National Health.

And if you think that isn't a cause for concern for everyone, remember that an estimated one woman in six in this country has had an abortion, that 75 per cent of abortions occur as a result of contraceptive failure and that the number of deaths from abortion, both legal and illegal, has fallen since the 1967 Abortion Act made them more freely available.

Making abortion illegal does not make it go away and if the now notorious Corrie Bill becomes law, the consequences are inevitable — more back-street abortions, more deaths and more unwanted children.

Campaigning against this retrogressive legislation are the TUC, the National Abortion Campaign and the Campaign Against The Corrie Bill. This Friday and Saturday (26 and 27) Rock Against Sexism are holding two benefit gigs at Goldsmith's College and the University of London Union (see Gig Guide for details) and on Sunday a massive turn-out is expected at a demonstration called by the TUC and NAC against the bill. The demo starts at 12 noon at Speakers Corner and will march to Trafalgar Square.

If you believe that each individual woman, rather than a male MP, has the right to decide what to do with her own body, why not go along?

Beatles Non-Reunion Shock

THE LATEST in the long line of Beattie Reunion stories is lifted from this month's issue of Rolling Stone (it does have its uses) which in turn lifted it from the New York Post. (Hmmm, Thrills scoops the world again: Ed.)

The story which no-one really believes, did, they tell us, nearly happen. LA-based writer and filmmaker, Dirk Summers, with the help of UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim did schedule a concert in aid of the boat people for between September 15th and October 7th, in the 4000-seat Grand Opera Theatre in Geneva, Switzerland.

George reputedly committed himself, and said he'd bring Paul and Ringo, but Waldheim and Summers would have to persuade John. John, however, had just left New York for Tokyo, and it took three weeks to track him down by which time it was too late for the original date.

Summers, however, is reported still optimistic, although he admits that after the Lennons saw New York promoter Sid Bernstein's recent full-page ad in the New York Times, they said they "would have nothing to do with it (the concert) if Bernstein was involved".

Apparently Summers is now striving for an early November date and hopes to have the concert albums on sale by Christmas.

DEANNE PEARSON

THRILLS

O.K. Errol Dunkley

SWITCHING on TOTP halfway through and seeing Errol Dunkley steppin' his stuff to 'O.K. Fred' came like a musical shock attack — that after fourteen anonymous years on the Jamaican recording scene he was getting some of the recognition due to him.

"Originally, 'OK Fred' wasn't gonna release here," Errol told us as we sat within the plush confines of WEA in Soho. "But it came over here on import, the people like it and start asking for it. Well, we couldn't get enough copies on import so we decided to release it... and look at it now."

A youthful 28 year old, Dunkley is soft spoken with more than a touch of melancholy in his voice. He is a sufferer and appears resigned to the fact, though his newly found success provides a glimmer of hope for the future.

During his musical career he has worked with most of Jamaica's top producers. "You name them, I've been through them," he says.

"Prince Buster was my first in 63/64, then Joe Gibbs, Coxson Dodd, Jimmy El Rodway, Bunny Lee, Randy's, Sonia Pottinger, Rupie Edwards... a whole heap of them."

In 1970 as a response to continual exploitation Errol along with Gregory Isaacs launched their 'African Museum' label and inspired a lot of other young artists, tired of being ripped off, to follow in their footsteps. It was a move which simultaneously brought about a change in attitude from the producers as the growth of independents, threatened their control.

African Museum provided Errol with one of his biggest sellers 'Movie Star' but the Dunkley-Isaacs partnership was relatively short lived and though they separated financially they continued to work together musically.

"It's been a struggle but as he says, 'I've always been on the scene with a little one record way down in the background' and over the years he's built a name amongst the reggae buying public. Both his most recent offerings 'Come Natural' and 'Rush Me No Badness' were self produced and sold enough to 'cover', as did last year's Dennis Bovell produced disco 45 'A Little Way Different' which was one of the most inspired discs to be produced here in England.

Reggae is the music of "the small people, the ghetto people", says Errol and experience has taught that he can't get the sound he wants in England and so it necessitates regular trips to JA. On the other hand he's emphatic that whether or not he should meet with success there's no way he'll go back to the living in the ghetto conditions in which he grew. Errol Dunkley is no romantic and as a ghetto youth his whole perspective is conditioned by his experiences. The question of shutting off or erasing memories of the past doesn't arise 'cause he knows where he's coming from.

Billy Brown: "Enormous In Ballyshannon."

"THE MAN'S a fool," says Billy Brown, "thank God," nibbling at the hand that might help keep him fed with large brandies and bounty bars for the limited rest of his natural. "Are you sure he wasn't taking a hand at me?"

Billy, it might be useful to explain, is half-owner, song-writer, arranger, keyboards plonker and vocalist with the Freshmen, whose latest release, 'Never Heard Anything Like It', (on Release) was reviewed by Danny Baker a while ago and given the sort of reception it Papa received at Knock. Like, enthusiastic.

Single of the Week, no less. "Oh get out and buy it! ... Will chiv (chiv?) strips off the most snotty of hearts ... And much more along the same neatly-hyped lines.

"That wee fellow's very perceptive," says Billy. "I like his bit about us not sounding like beginners."

Billy has been on the road with the Freshmen for the last 20 years. He'd rather it wasn't mentioned he's 36 years old.

In the pub in Terenure, a non-salubrious Dublin suburb, Paddy-the-Roadie is tight-faced and ashen-lipped with agitation on account of there's a gig tonight in Ballyshannon which is about 200 miles away in the wild North West along bouncy boroens which would break the heart of St Brigid herself, never mind the springs of a 1968 Vauxhall Victor. Also, Billy's drinking brandy and eating bounty bars again which Paddy reckons is no diet for a sick man.

"Balls to Ballyshannon", explains Billy. "This isn't the Evening Herald, baby-doll. This is the New Musical Express. This could be a great plug. Look, try and get in a bit about I regard the NME as the bible ... How about a picture of me reading it, eh? Suit yourself. When I started reading the NME Keith Fordyce was doing the singles."

On his thin days Billy looks almost ethereal, in a ravaged sort of way, a pock-marked pre-Raphaelite, an aesthete on the morning after a thousand nights before, with languid hair daintily dishevelled and finely-chiselled cheek-knaris balancing baby-blue eyes. That's his thin days. Then he puts the brandy-and-bountiful beef on again. The diet is by way of a medical experiment designed to disprove what the doctors say about diabetes.

For more years than Feargal Sharkey has strutted this green earth, everybody in the music business in Ireland has been saying that Billy's nothing short of a genius and should have cut out long ago from the endless concentric circuits of parish halls, borderland ballrooms and Gaelic Athletic Association Summer Festival marquees for London or LA or somewhere canny cognoscenti would surely recognise him as a suitable case for culting.

He comes from a very musical background. His uncle Willie played flute in a Kick-the-Pope band in Lerne, Co. Antrim, a tight wee Protestant town. Billy turned pro at 14, was the centre-piece in a three-child country-and-western outfit.

"Goldmine In The Sky at Twelfth soils in Orange Halls. Went down a bomb."

Two years on, in 1959, he formed the Freshmen with his altar-id Derek Dean, a bawdily boisterous bulk with a face like the side of a mountain from Strabane in Co. Tyrone where everybody is a Catholic and unemployed except the policemen.

They have played, Billy reckons, more than 4,000 gigs, which helps them not to sound like sloppy beginners. They have released seven LPs and maybe 25 singles onto Ireland's tiny market, they even once reached no. 1 in or around '65.

They've changed styles as often as was apt, onstage they still do the best version of 'Barbara Ann' to be heard outside Brian Wilson's lippped lid.

Billy and Big Derek are the two survivors of the early line-up and, having discarded a minibus of managers, jointly own the band. They have had their ups and downers, sometimes going downhill so fast they needed air-brakes.

Along the road Billy has acquired what might be accounted versatility. In spare moments he plays Chopin (he's even given recitals!), he's available as session man for symphony orchestras, MD for music progs on Telefeis Eireann, writes advertising jingles for Guinness, jams on tenor sax with a not-bad modern jazz mob on Sunday mornings.

"I know if I kept at it I'd eventually be noticed."

He wrote the new single 'Never Heard Anything Like It' in an hour after deciding "to try myself out as a punk. Maybe I've always been a punk. Mozart's a punk if you listen to him right."

"Are you certain they're going to print this shit? I wouldn't mind selling a few records, everything helps. And your man was right, you know. It's a bloody lovely record."

"And I'm a bloody lovely fella. I'm enormous in Ballyshannon."

ARCHIVE FUN

TIME WAS when all the most fab entertainers had what Sub-Editors once affectionally referred to as 'Lifelines'. You know; fax, info, name of pet, colour of eyes, favourite method of self-abuse.

Even a recalcitrant protest singer like Bob Dylan had 'em. And in a rare moment of introspection he sat down in the spring of '65 and penned them at the behest of NME.

Those at the vanguard of social behaviour at the time were widely believed to have already felt the effects of the impending Kool-Aid conspiracy. As our picture shows.

Stranglers Film Bore

DON'T BE surprised when you see The Stranglers' 'Nuclear Device' TV film, filmed in Portugal two weeks ago. The scene (described in NME last week), where the Stranglers hurt bottles and abuse at an aborigine has now been cut, as the producers felt that it might be construed by the BBC as racist.

Considering The Stranglers already precarious relationship with the BBC — in the past the group have walked off a 'Rock Goes To College' programme and smashed in a BBC studio door, the producers have obviously decided to try at all costs to avoid jeopardising their situation.

The promotional film for the single, 'Duchess', which featured The Stranglers singing in church, also offended the Bep banned by the Corporation.

Hugh Cornwell, however, is playing it safe with his promotional film for his solo single, taken from the 'Nosferatu' album, Cream's 'White Room' (released on October 26). The film contains nothing remotely controversial — except Hugh Cornwell — and features Hugh and drummer Robert Williams playing the song in an otherwise empty white room.

The pair are dressed in traditional black, and the film, made in black and white hand flushed with a fluorescent mauve hue, is shot mostly through the windows of 'the white room', showing Williams playing real and imaginary drumkit, and Hugh plucking his guitar strings like a bow singing and swaying in a trance-like state.

Snortergate: Jet Set Hangout In Jeopardy

ANYONE who follows the grubby ups and downs of American political gossip will be well aware that President Carter's White House chief of staff Hamilton Jordan has been getting a hard time from the media since it was alleged that Jordan had been snorting cocaine at Hollywood parties and at New York's flashiest disco, Studio 54.

All through the scandal, the White House has denied the allegations and, although ordering an FBI investigation, has made the tacit suggestion that the charges were the creation of Studio 54 owner Steve Rubell (the man who vets the disco's would-be customers at the door to see if they are cute enough to be allowed inside) to lighten the load of a tax evasion rap under which he is currently sweating.

The rumour mill went into high gear a couple of weeks ago when, on October 4th, John (Johnny C) Conaghan, a self-confessed coke dealer to the Studio 54 inner circle, went on the ABC-TV news show 20-20, along with Steve Rubell and publicist Barry Landau, and stated categorically that he had supplied coke to Hamilton Jordan.

Two days later, while the beautiful people were inside shaking their booties, Drug Enforcement Agency officers grabbed Johnny C off the sidewalk outside Studio 54 and busted him for selling 100 quaaludes to a DEA informer.

Nothing so strange in that, you might say. Why shouldn't the DEA bust a known dealer, particularly one who is rash enough to sell pills to a narc?

The problems started when it came to light that the sale in question had taken place in April, 1978, and that it had taken the DEA eighteen months to apply for a warrant to arrest Conaghan. To further muddy the picture, this had been done only after the advance promotion for the 20-20 show had gone out to the media.

Revenge? A warning to Johnny C to keep his mouth shut in the future? Not so, say the DEA and Assistant U.S. Attorney Dominic Amorosa. Other people, however, including influential New York Daily Post columnist Jimmy Breslin, are not so sure.

The following week another blow fell on Studio 54 when Mayor Edward Koch ordered the New York liquor licensing authorities to conduct a full scale inquiry into the running of the disco, with particular reference to whether drugs were being used or sold on the premises. If the result of this proves to be unfavourable, Studio 54 could be closed down and the chicest of chic forced to find a new venue for their showing off.

With closure staring them in the face, Rubell and his partner seem to be doing all that they can do to cash in on the club's rapidly tarnishing reputation. A disco compilation album titled "A Night At Studio 54" is receiving saturation TV advertising, while a line of Studio 54 jeans are being promoted with the slogan "you can always get into Studio 54... jeans."

Johnny C appears in court on October 25th and meanwhile, as the cliché goes, the plot thickens.

Johnny G: One Man And His Bass Drum, Hi-Hat, Telecaster And Mouth-Harp.

SPECIAL

ONE-MAN bands are a bit thin on the ground these days. In fact Johnny G. Getting seems to have cornered the market.

"I'm never happier than when I'm on stage — alone — in the middle of a twelve-bar. You can't get any further into blues, now can you?"

It's not exactly Cloud 9 by my reckoning, but the intrepid Mr. G — bass drum (right foot), hi-hat (left), telecaster, mouth-harp, vocals — clearly runs this kind of gauntlet with compulsive commitment. He even played support on Parker And The Rumour's European Tour — 5000-seaters choc-full of rowdy, beer-fuelled Krauts and one spotlight, one speck on stage, talking, strumming, singing. I'd be petrified.

"If you weren't nervous, you wouldn't do it," comes the logical reply. "I'm convinced of that. Shy people are attracted to stages. Being on stage gets to be like your drug, and it's like your life's work to deal with it."

Nine years on the circuit hasn't left Johnny G short of experience, a career that's roller-coasted between Feelgood R & B bands and solo club acts, self-management and promotion by "showbiz creeps", recognition and misconception. Some of his more courageous projects — such as initiating self-produced singles and pioneering white reggae — were largely dismissed by the more pedantic musical climate of the early '70s.

He cut a five-track live EP in '72, a good six years before those near-legendary independents, The Desperate Bicycles.

"I do believe I was the first to do it. I was a bit phobic about the business, it was slightly more closed than it is now. It was just pure fear really, and so I decided to make my own record. I borrowed a tape-recorder, taped it, took it up to Lintune and said, 'Could you make this into a record, please?' They were really insulting and said, 'It's not loaded up correctly' — that kind of thing."

They pressed up 1000 for £200, but he stopped selling any after breaking even at 600. "A horrible record, it just sounded so wrong", he adds, aiming a disparaging glance at the trunk collecting dust in the corner. "The other 400's in there."

The second project was a widely misunderstood, short-lived show performed in The 100 Club under the slightly misleading banner of 'I Wish I Was Born A Darkie'. It lasted twenty-five minutes.

"It wasn't meant to be provocative", he explains, "but — obviously — it wasn't offensive. I'm half-Indian, so not only was it about being ex-Empire but also about the problems of being 'relatively white' and trying to play 'black' music. It sounds absurd now — remember this was '72 — but I did have a lot of problems playing reggae music. People kept coming up to me and saying 'You're not black — you shouldn't be playing it'. That's why the words are deliberately provocative."

"I wanted to use the whole set for a first LP called 'I Think I'm Going Black', but record companies wanted something direct, something that couldn't possibly be interpreted as offensive, and nobody was content with the one-man band. It wasn't going to make me a rock star so they didn't like it."

"But a band's so constricting when you like so many types of music. That's why I got so frustrated in bands. When I've tried to do a straight rock thing it's always fallen to pieces. I tried last year and people thought it was great — 'cos they were used to seeing me clumping around on my own — and when they actually saw me playing the guitar and arrangements they were knocked out. But then they'd come again and it'd be exactly the same set, you know, 'cos you've got your little list pasted on the monitor and all that shit. I went to leave all that behind. For ever."

Cut to '77. Johnny G was supporting anyone who'd give him a gig, from John Miles to FBI. He was even billed for a Pistols slot but his manager hauled him out in case his gear got remodelled. Finally, after playing warm-up for Can — a more ludicrous coupling would tax the imagination — Beggars Banquet took him under their contractual wing and released 'Call Me Bwana', the single he'd been toting around record companies for nearly five years.

Since then his colourful debut album for Beggars, 'G Sharp/G Natural', has come the closest to painting a sympathetic portrait of his varied talents, a rich amalgam of styles embracing reggae, latin, dustbowl, jig-shuffle and honky-tonk, with a strong blues undercurrent. The backline features Brett Marvin And The Thunderbolts — who, along with Jonah Lewis, he rates as "a major influence" — using Aesop's drummer, Angus Gays, to keep a snap-tight reggae rhythm. Strung somewhere between a sly wit and pure pathos, it's an intriguing, intoxicating mixture.

Perfectionist almost to a fault, Johnny G is a touch more critical. He hasn't even got a copy of the album.

"It's main fault was its lack of unity, so I want to maintain the variety and acquire a unity. As an album, it doesn't quite come off. It was a cheap album glossed-up rather than an explosive one presented plainly, and that's exactly what I want to do next."

Next being February, now being the pub gig circuit. Keep an ear to the ground, that's an order.

THE NEW PORTABLE SOUND STUDIO

This Philips N2233 automatic recorder looks simple enough.

Simple to operate yes, but there's a lot more to the Philips N2233 than its smart looks let on.

It's much more like a portable sound studio.

Of course it records cassettes like ordinary recorders. And the quality is a lot more than you'd expect from something so small.

The Philips N2233 has a cue and revue capability too.

This enables you to put together your own selection of music. It also lets you play back material the moment you have recorded it. Watch out Kid Jensen!

You'll agree that such a sophisticated piece of equipment as the Philips N2233 shouldn't be called simply a cassette recorder.

The portable sound studio is much more flattering.

Ears Of A Clown

SHANE McGOWAN — a legend in his own lunch-time — the man with the biggest ears since Prince Charles! ADRIAN THRILLS lends his own ear to THE NIPS and discovers you don't have to be pretty to be hip.

The Nips:
l to r: Ringo Watts,
Blondie Douglas, Shanne
Bradley, Shane McGowan.
Pic: Andy Calvert

PAUL WELLER once referred to him as "the only real star to come out of the new wave". To Nick Kent he was 'Monsieur Vale', the delinquent who exquisitely squirted globules of lacquer into the hair of his mates at an early Clash gig, while Tony Parsons once saw fit to dub him 'the original kamikaze punk' no less.

The individual in question is Shane McGowan — or Shane O'Hooligan as he now terms himself. The oddest thing about the various compliments and insults paid to him above is that they were all delivered long before Shane actually started to make a name for himself by sole virtue of his not inconsiderable musical talents as singer, occasional rhythm guitarist and songwriter in his band The Nips.

Shane, y'see, has been a personality of sorts ever since — as punk legend would have it — he chanced to have his earlobe bitten off at yet another of those primal Clash bashes.

Actually, the tales of the said incident are a trifle exaggerated, the earlobe remaining in what looks suspiciously like one piece to me, but the escapade served nonetheless to establish Shane as one of the more unlikely fifteen-minute heroes of the sub-culture as it was then.

Modestly not being one of his biggest virtues, Shane accepts the mantle of The Celebrity with an obvious relish. And this, it transpires, is only the beginning.

"The way I see it is that we're coming up to the 80's and somebody's got to save rock'n'roll from all those prats with synthesisers and a university education. And it might as well be me!

"You've got to have someone to deal with all those people who are into Gary Numan and the Gang Of Four. You've got to get them where it hurts!

SHANE and I are talking in the early hours of a Friday morning in a squat just off London's Euston Road. The humble hovel is the abode of Shanne Bradley, the Nips bass player since their formation nearly two years ago. Shanne was here a minute ago only to mysteriously bigger off, while drummer Ringo Watts (I said so, popkidds) has gone home leaving just Shane and guitarist Blondie, Douglas to bartake in a severely inebriated interview.

Blondie struggles to get the odd word in edgeways.

In addition to being very much the driving force behind the group, Shane is under no illusions as to where The Nips are headed musically.

"We're loud, raw, leering pop. Know what I mean?" he asserts aggressively.

"It is bands like The Undertones that have the right idea. You play songs and you play them loud and fast so that you can dance to them. That's what Punk was all about. That's what everybody was rebelling against... all that progressive shit."

Shane is a pop traditionalist at heart. He'll even admit to admiring and trying to sing like Van Morrison at times. And though I find his aversion to the Gang Of Four a misguided one, there's usually plenty of truth in most of what he says.

The Nips — or the Nipple Erectors as they were then known — played their first gig at a Roxy Club audition night towards the end of 1977. By then, Shane, like so many of the 'original' London punks was sufficiently disillusioned with the 'scene' as it stood to turn to other areas for his musical excitement.

In his case a reversion to Rockabilly provided the stopgap.

"Punk just seemed to be such a load of shit at the time. When it started it was great, but then you got so many wanky bands coming along. It was getting really bad around the middle of 1977 with all those talentless Vortex groups like The Ants and 999. It was just a load of speeded-up heavy metal calling itself punk."

"Rockabilly was simpler. You could dance to it. I'm not into it as much now as I was then. Good rockabilly is great but bad rockabilly is awful and there's a lot of that about."

"But I was younger then," he chuckles, "I've got things sussed out a lot more now."

The Rockabilly-Punk hybrid that The Nips were pushing in their early days seemed a pretty contrived image-making publicity gambit.

"No, it wasn't really contrived," retorts Shane. "It was just that I was obsessed with Rock and Roll at the time. I just got so sick of punk and started listening to rock 'n' roll again. It was just that I'd been missing out on it all the time."

"I could dance to that but I couldn't dance to 999."

FROM their confused beginnings, The Nips went on to lose firstly their original drummer, the legendary Gasbag contributor Arcane Vendetta of Ilford, and, secondly, their godawful original name.

As Shane would tell you: "We were always one of the biggest jokes on the scene when we were the Nipple Erectors. Everyone says that we changed the name to get wider acceptance and radio play, which is partly true, but the main reason was just that we got sick of the name. It was sort of like 'What band are you?' — Whaaaaa!!!!??"

The Nipple Erectors?!! — well, I'm not going to talk to you."

"Anyway it was Shanne who thought up the name, which was pretty typical of her. You get pretty tired of a name like that pretty quickly."

Although he was also quick to tire of the rhetoric of the original punk figureheads, Shane does cite a couple of the unlikely faces of '76 as the ones who have actually gone on to achieve what they set out to do.

He is particularly generous in his praise — and this is strictly a mutual thing — of Paul Waller.

"He's the only fucker out of all that lot who's actually come through. The only one who's done what he set out to do. And at least he still fuckin' talks to me!"

"The two bands who got most of the criticism were The Jam and The Damned. The Jam used to get slagged off as being just a revivalist band and The Damned were supposedly not a punk band, just a heavy metal band or whatever."

"The Pistols and The Clash were always the two big cool bands to watch. But they just became like fuckin' companies! It was like going to watch ICI on stage! Fuck all that lot!"

The Nips' third single on Soho Records is due out shortly. It is a song called 'Gabrielle'. While the previous two, the Rockabilly-tinged 'King Of The Bop' and the superior R&B of 'All The Time In The World' were attractive but erratic singles, 'Gabrielle' is a redoubtable classic. It is also quite easily the best regeneration of the hoary old 'Louie Louie' riff since... since, oh, at least The Undertones' 'Jump Boys'.

"Gabrielle was this girl who used to go down to that punk club Louise's," explains Shane.

"She used to have blonde hair and tight leather look plastic trousers and she used to model for Strawberry Studios. She was my first real love, but she wouldn't ever go to bed with me. She just used to take me back to her bedsit in Streatham and jerk me off! She had a bit of a hangup about sex."

Shane puts his 'girl trouble' down to what he'd call his 'physical handicaps' — big ears and what were the worst set of front teeth this side of Jerry Dammers until a couple of weeks ago when he had them capped.

"You can't really let that sort of thing handicap you. I mean if you have the sort of handicaps that I had then you're always going to be the sort of kid who gets pushed around at school by the big blokes."

"I never always had bad teeth, but I got pissed down the Red Cow one night seeing the 101'ers with a mate. We came out really drunk and he said that he'd give me a lift home on the back of his bike, but I tried to get off while he was still moving and I broke all my teeth on Hammersmith Road!"

"I suppose I was always made to feel like a bit of a wanker at school and I always found it hard to pick up girls at discos 'cause I was so ugly."

"I mean, the punk thing fuckin' changed my life. It didn't matter that I was ugly. Know what I mean? Nothing mattered. It was good."

"But I still hate all that shit about whether or not you're short or tall or ugly or you look like something from Austin Reid!"

The interview over, Shane and I were to make our way out of Shanne's flat for the short journey across a couple of backstreets back to his place.

That was the original plan, until we ran into a spot of trouble courtesy of a gang of fast year's mondo-bondage punk crew, seemingly intent on smashing Guinness bottles over our heads.

But then Shane — the original punk-turned-red-cum-punk — had the indecency to ask why he got the reply "You two look like Mods to us!"

Sometimes you just can't win.

A missive from The Great Pop Wars by PAUL MORLEY

the Factory single was Finney-Perrin's 'Time Goes By So Slow' backed with Wright's 'Pillowfight'. I could do nothing but make Factory t2 single of the week. Ripples reached Island Records.

ON a quiet grey Sunday afternoon a few weeks later, I sat alone in my London flat I phone Steve Perrin. Hey, I say, I go to America for a couple of weeks and when I get back you've signed with bloody Island Records. No longer on the outside looking in!

"Yeah, it happened quick really," he tells me. "People at Island seem to want to update their image, and we were encouraged to sign because they'd signed The Slits and the B-52's and seemed good people to go with. It wasn't really surprising when it happened. And now we're getting gigs in London and we can't get any in Manchester." He sighs at the injustice.

The group have arranged a free gig at Manchester's Fun House on December 1st — the first date available: a present for their fans. They've re-done 'It Doesn't Bother Me' with John Astley producing for their first single, and will be preparing an LP in January.

"We went through a week of just being really pleased," says Perrin, which sounds like something a member of a pop group would say, "but now we're getting down to some hard work and rehearsal, cos it's easy for it to all fall flat."

"In a way it's weird cos like I still get the NME every week and see all these names that are getting on TOTP and now we're close to them... like opening the NME and seeing that big picture of Mike staring out at me from the live pages. It frightens me... I don't think we've really come to terms with it yet. I hope we never really do, in a way."

THE DISTRACTIONS are the types who always get the obnoxious, non-stop chattering idiot sat next to them on the bus. They're the confused underdogs, each in different ways.

Their songs are born out of unfortunate problem page experiences, nervousness, vivid humour, revenge, relief. With vivid accuracy and comprehensive urgency they deal with inadequacy, hesitancy, prejudice. Wise words about naivety and jealousy that drip with delicious imagery.

Like the two other great British pop groups XTC and The Undertones there are two sets of songwriters within the band. Adrian Wright's songs are weary, almost nasty. Perrin-Perrin songs are bitter, twisted, ironic, hurt...

"I'm basically very romantic," decides Perrin, "but there's just so many things fighting against it. I know that jealousy is the most absurd thing in the world but it doesn't stop me getting ridiculously jealous. I wish someone would get jealous about me! That's a hell of a compliment. It's like I've written all these songs about other people, why doesn't somebody write a song about me?"

"That's because they don't know you've written songs about them!" Finney points out.

Maybe Pete Shelley has written a song about you, I say. "It's a possibility," says Perrin as we reach the station and he flings me out of the car.

HAPPINESS IS JUST A DISTRACTION

IN THE basement of a small recording studio in Manchester pop's newest darlings are rehearsing.

Instruments and speakers are squashed into the dark cellar leaving just enough room for five Distractions to stand or sit, and for me to squat and listen. Listen to a series of songs so succinct and suggestive: pure pop songs. It's not quite fair to describe The Undertones as 'perfect pop' without becoming fully acquainted with The Distractions' mature and endless repertoire. The spirit is the same. It confuses the cynics, and wins the hearts of those who know and will not be swayed.

The Distractions sound is distinguished by the needly, jangly guitar quarrelling of Steve Perrin and Adrian Wright: "I just wanted to find a sound as far away as possible from the usual heavy riffing," explains Perrin, "and this is what I ended up with."

Distinguished by the subtle, seductive soul singing of the unlikely looking Mike Finney: "I like Otis Redding," Finney says, "but I can't sing like him! I tell you, if Wilson Pickett said tomorrow that our new single was great I'd be over the moon."

Distinguished by the fluid orchestrated passion of the five instrumentalists... "That's work innit?" dismisses Perrin, "we work hard on the guitar parts and the vocal parts... at the moment the five people are working really well. I'm not going to kid myself that it's going to last forever but while it is I'm going to make the most of it."

The group rehearses into the night. Organising still further the devastating detail of songs already recorded, 'It Doesn't Bother Me', 'Maybe It's Love' from their four track EP 'You're Not Going Out Dressed Like That', the new single 'Time Goes By So Slow' and its B side 'Pillowfight' and classics known and loved by their considerable home following, 'Waiting For The Rain', 'One Way Love', and the legendary 'Valerie'.

MANCHESTER pub, a table, The Distractions sat around the table.

"I hate corny dancers," Finney says, utterly uncaring about his uncool double chin and wiry spectacles. "If there's one thing I can't stand it's corny dancers! They're even worse than lousy comics!"

The Distractions are in a good mood. After all, this very day they've received free passes for Manchester's respectable nightclub The Factory. A sign of success. And that's not all. "Howard Devoto likes to stand around in clubs and let everyone see him," Finney whispers in my ear, "and he usually doesn't let on to me. The other day he waved at me! Like this," he raises his arm, "I thought, waving! What's this?"

"That's when he decided he'd arrived," explains Perrin, "when Howard Devoto waved to him!" Now, of course, The Factory has closed. And The Distractions are probably hipper than Howard Devoto.

In the Manchester pub, we're wondering about The Distractions sound. "I don't know what to call it," shrugs Perrin, "think of a name and I shall reject it!"

He gets very earnest when any sort of label is mentioned.

"I do! It's terrible innit? I hate living up to labels... we are a whatever group... Kellcogs!... we are a Kellcogs group!... people ask us what sort of music do you play. It's the most stupid question! What can you say?"

"The nearest I get," offers Finney, "when people ask me what we play is well do you know the Buzzcocks, it's a bit like that only not. What can you say?"

"You could try Starry Eyed And Laughing. The Distractions guitar sound perfectly resembles the old Zigzag favourite energetic interpretation of Byrd patterns. 'Well I will from now on,' humours Finney.

THE GROUP are rehearsing in the studio cellar for a strange date on the Norway cabaret circuit.

Seriously! The ghost of Les Dawson lurks in the back ground. It's desperation, really. They've been playing through necessity the incestuous, limited Manchester rounds for approaching two years, and feeling frustrated. "We played Sheffield once," cracks Perrin, "and we got travel sick."

But Norway? Cabaret? The group shrug their shoulders. It'll be experience.

On stage, the group look the part. Their presence is lovable verging on the Opportunity Knocks; there is a huge disruptive gap between the way they look and the searing sensitivity of their songs. A deceptiveness comparable with The Undertones.

But Norway? Cabaret? Perrin particularly hated the idea, but the vision of months with no gigs carried them through to the audition. Their true feelings have them getting drunk, insulting the panel of judges and playing what they felt was terrible. They hoped in a way they'd blown it. They learnt next day that they'd been booked for a month of Norway nightclubs.

They never went. A few days after painfully deciding that, no matter what, they couldn't face the degradation, Island Records moved in with the pen, the paper and the promises.

MANCHESTER pub, a table, The Distractions getting drunk.

Four boys and a girl who likes girls. Singer Mike Finney, guitarist Steve Perrin, guitarist Adrian Wright, drummer Alex Sidebottom and bassist Pip Nicholls. A chubby one, a small one, a serious one, a scruffy one and a girl who likes girls. "I tried to pretend I was bisexual," Pip says, "but I just couldn't con myself."

Pip's presence, which is treated as no big deal, emphasises the ambiguity in Distractions songs of relationship and reasoning.

They entered the year having been around since the time Buzzcocks were just breaking out of Manchester, and seemed to be going nowhere. They had established a sound and were confident about it.

They could have gone two ways: 'noise' ('Sister Ray') or arranged songs ('I'd always wanted to play the guitar solo in 'I Heard Her Call My Name'). Determined to reject rather than passively absorb influences, they went for arranged songs.

Tony Davidson, a local businessman who runs a rehearsal studio and record label and fancies himself as a whizz kid pop entrepreneur, charged up to the group: "Hey, you got a good review in Sounds, how do you fancy me putting out a record for you?" He didn't like the group much, but somehow, out of a multitude of disagreements and misunderstandings, a four track EP came out on Davidson's flash TJM label. I could do nothing but make 'You're Not Going Out Dressed Like That' single of the week. It's still a favourite.

It wasn't a very good business deal, but at least The Distractions had a record out and a few more people picked them out of the crowd. Tony Wilson of Factory Records asked them if they'd like to put a record out on his label.

They in turn asked if he'd be their manager. He had to decline. He likes to think of the people he manages as 'his children.' He calls A Certain Ratio, a group he does manage, 'my boys.' He admitted he couldn't feel that way about The Distractions, despite loving their music. Drummer Alex, after all, is older than Wilson, with a history with local groups stretching way back into the '80s.

Local studio man Brandon Leon became their manager, and produced their records. "I went along to see them for the first time at TJ Davidson's rehearsal studio. He'd asked me to see this group," he recalls, "and they were playing, with no PA, and it was awful. Oh god, I thought, what have I let myself in for. I turned to the guy who was stood next to me, he looked like one of the band's father, and I asked him what he did. I'm the lead singer, he said."

After much humming and haaing,

WE GOT THE IDEA FROM AIWA.

The power of hi-fi stacked less than 12" high. With specifications that sound like science fiction.

The cassette deck keeps wow and flutter down to 0.09% (WRMS). And the power amp delivers a pulsating 30 watts per channel into 4 ohms.

It's probably the smallest real hi-fi on Earth. Or anywhere else.

SINGLES

SINGLE OF THE WEEK

THE JAM: Eton Rifles (Polydor). For their naivety, their occasional errors of judgment, and the periods of confusion and self-doubt they seem to suffer, The Jam's determination to push against the barriers of style and against the limited outlook of the cult they have more or less unwittingly spawned is a blessed relief. If any British group is likely to forge a body of work with sufficient self-contained strength to survive the era then they are most probably that group. 'Eton Rifles' takes a cold look at some especially insidious British institutions such as letting little boys play with guns in the Combined Cadet Corps and nationalism and class and other things that haven't figured strongly in the charts since Elvis Costello's 'Oliver's Army'. Except unlike 'Oliver's Army' it doesn't soft-pedal the point. Its tone matches its ire.

The Jam made the first nouveau mod single last year when they cut 'David Watts'. They're not exactly hanging around waiting for the chance to make the last. And that's what it's all about.

KEVIN DUNN: Nadine (B Records Import). If this wasn't harder to find than a punchline on a Public Image single it would be a record of the week. Kevin Dunn is a nobody in his spare time whose honour it is to have the second ever release on the label that last year brought the world The B-52s. Their gifted eccentricity has rubbed off on this, a garage synthesiser version of the old Chuck Berry battle hymn. Dunn takes 'Nadine' and defaces it with a synth and a sense of trash art style that wouldn't have been at all out of place on a Roxy Music B-side from '74. The sort of record that makes you want to get up and start stamping on insects.

LORI AND THE CHAMELEONS: Touch (Sire / Zoo). An impossibly sexy record licensed from Liverpool's Zoo label that does to Donna Summer what The Flying Lizards did to Barrett Strong only it does it one hundred per cent better, and I hesitate to even mention the Lizards in the same paragraph as the very great Lori and her Chameleons, whoever they turn out to be.

Set in the land of the rising sun, but to a disco beat, 'Touch' evokes the mysteries of the East and the mysteries of adolescence, love and the Orient in first flower, the vicarious thrill of holiday romances, the denouement of travel brochures, all this and more, and does it in the guise of a spoken postcard with a chorus that breathlessly invites you to 'Touch... touch...'

Enter into the spirit of it before everybody else does.

MADNESS: One Step Beyond (Stiff). Madness are a whole bunch of fun on stage, given the right mood of inebriety. They dish up a vaudeville revue of skinhead reggae and cockney rock the shortcomings of which are easily overlooked when one adopts an appropriately legless stance. But such atmospheres dissipate like the mist when you try to pin them down on a disc, which is why the sleeve of their first single for Stiff is closer to that nifty sound than the actual record. It's an old bind to be sure and it's arguable whether they will surmount it much less stop bouncing and stomping long enough to even consider it. For the time being they step forward with another Prince Buster remake, 'One Step Beyond', the instrumental B-side of 'Al Capone'. The rhythm is, naturally, too fast, but it's carried by a fog horn of a sax that steams along in the style once beloved of New Orleans records such as Frankie Ford's 'Sea Cruise', though this is probably closer in spirit to 'Mouldy Old Dough'.

If The Selecter sometimes threaten to become just the next Darts then all Madness need is the next Chaz Jankel to help them become the junior Blockheads for junior blockheads.

SECRET AFFAIR: Let Your Heart Dance (I Spy). Secret Affair seem so unashamedly calculating that it's hard to even begin to take them seriously. Their act is so water-tight you could sail in it — without fear of running up on any ideological ground, because there's none to run up on. The best they can offer is 'action'. And they run up huge dry-cleaning bills to prove that they know where this 'action' is.

'Let Your Heart Dance' tries for the live party feel of a Junior Walker disc and sticks as close as four power pop musicians can to the elements of Temi's success without putting permanent strain on their abilities. It makes all the noises that are culturally viable at this moment in time; words like 'dance', 'style' and 'two-tone' get a thorough airing, though I can't find any reference to 'action', and underlying the record is the kind of genuine warmth and respect for the soul idiom that Showaddywaddy once brought to rock'n'roll.

BELLAMY BROTHERS: Wet T Shirt (Warner Brothers). The appalling Bellamy Brothers release another fine tribute to the stunted libido in their determined effort to have chart hits no matter what level of cheap innuendo they have to resort to. Calling it innuendo just labours the obvious. The word I'm searching for is tape.

DEAD KENNEDYS: California Uber Alles (Fast Product). Picked up for English release by the usually discriminating Fast Product label, this is the already mildly infamous Dead Kennedys' first and so far only record. It manages to be almost as foul and funny as their name, as it mocks Governor Jerry Brown's recent presidential initiative with open if not quite scathing contempt, and achieves an even lower count than The Dickies on the scale of things that make rock'n'roll, the difference being The Dead Kennedys weren't even trying.

The Kennedys seem too genuinely ignorant of even the finer graces of punk rock; they sound like the only thing they truly hold in awe is Black Sabbath's early records. If at times their music resembles Peter Hamill's 'Ricky Nadir' this is purely by accident. It is just about uncouth and sub-heavy metal enough to garner a following amongst the hordes of neophytes looking for something that passes for outrage in this complacent age, even though what might shock the Sunshine State will seem merely quaint to most of us.

Nevertheless, rumour has it they're already hard at work on a follow-up titled 'I Left My Car in Chappaquiddick' and guaranteed to earn them the resentment of Middle America.

ANGELIC UPSTARTS: Never 'Ad Nothin' (Warner Brothers). Yet typical anthemic death or glory story designed to edify the rabble even as it rouses them. We could debate its ultimate effect all day — but no matter how sympathetically the reasons why people go out in a blaze of headlines are portrayed, making them (the people and their reasons) the subject of dumb, quasi-heroic chants just might give some poor sod a good excuse to do it. Maybe Jimmy Pursey really is too thick to realise what effect he's having despite his hopeless attempts to avert it, but I doubt it, because if his conscience really troubled him so then why does he insist on producing this? At least 'I'm An Upstart' was garbage that didn't pretend to care the way this garbage does.

LOCAL OPERATOR: Law & Order (Virgin). Local Operator seem to think that if you want to concern yourself with the iniquities of British justice then the most suitable vehicle for protest is reggae. 'Law And Order' seeks to combine the addictiveness of an M s single with the superior moral strength of a reggae backbeat (and I mean that ironically). It glibly enforces some dangerous stereotypes and takes another cheap holiday in someone's misery without even the excuse of being a remotely good record.

THE DAMNED: Smash It Up (Chiswick). The Damned have made a half-way competent pop single that might even pass for Johnny Moped were it blessed with a trifle more inanity. Their ability to remain utterly morose even as they scale the peaks of a commercial anti-hill is an object lesson in the requirements of the rock game. Anyone with a glimmer of intelligence or sensitivity would have abandoned hope long ago.

THE KINKS: Moving Picture (Arista). Raymond Davies reflects on Life with a kind of banal levity that ensures his efforts will stir the philosophical musings of Radio One listeners. 'Life is a moving picture,' he cheerfully proclaims. Choosing to release such a tepid truism unfairly represents the humours of the album from which this is culled.

THE ADVERTS: Cast Of Thousands (RCA). A band that steadfastly refuses to acknowledge its own futility. Their one moment of singles fame came with the help of a song which bore a remarkable resemblance to an old Slade album track. Lacking any such inspiration on this occasion, they strum a sloppy, misconceived song about doom and other important things, and sound about as convinced of the need to make this statement as you are likely to be of the need to hear it. The unorthodox slant of TV Smith's lyrics may one day pay off, but not until he writes songs that aren't instantly forgettable and finds a band to play them that isn't instantly hopeless. All five Adverts wear mascara. Somewhere along the line there's a connection.

VILLAGE PEOPLE: Sleazy (Mercury). Deprived of their thunderous lead voice, The Village People have been forced to lay off making second-rate Four Tops records for the time being and rally instead with a tediously jolly disco chant. The Larry Graysons of the Amy! Set have also decided it's time to give their one joke a rest; not a single homosexual inference is made, not even a slight nudge. It's remarkable that these hucksters should want to break with a winning formula before it has even begun to be milked dry.

THIN LIZZY: Sarah (Vertigo). Not, as it happens, the sort of record that demands to be heard with legs astride and face screwed up; not a Les Paul power chord in earshot, even. As Lizzy's ranks get increasingly thin, so too does the lustre of their efforts. Songs that dote on the author's offspring, such as this maudlin, gooey lullaby for a sprog called Sarah, have the same effect as seeing parents address their little ones with words like 'oodylums' and 'ga-ga'. One is hard put not to cringe. All babies look the same to me anyway.

EARCOM: Contradiction (Fast Product). The second in an occasional series of Fast Product demo tape compilations that's too big to be a single, too small to be an LP, and too abstruse to be anything but the result of Fast entrepreneur Bob Last's continued espousal of the cult of the amateur.

But the six crude, ambitious and often half-realised examples collected here (two apiece from Thursdays, Bascax and Joy Division) form a far more coherent 20

She's a whole lot closer to Manhattan Transfer than she ever will be to Tom Waits, but for a Judy she sure knows how to pick her sax players.

I MUST admit that over the past couple of years it's been hard to work up any real enthusiasm for current Jamaican music — 90% of the records released in JA seem to be cover versions of older hits/rhythms arranged in whatever style the session musicians are playing at the time. Little attempt is made to improve the music itself, none of the producers try anything progressive or constructive anymore, and the general rule-of-thumb seems to be that if you can bang your syn-drum faster and louder than the promoter who ran the last session, you must be doing OK.

Even dub-wise, the engineers who used to find effects on their boards that weren't supposed to be there are now resting on their laurels. The greatest innovators — Sylvan Morris and King Tubby's — look like they don't care anymore, and have sunk to the same standard as their imitators. Surely someone (perhaps Tubby's new protégé 'Scientist') will risk mixing in a different style — the untried possibilities have to be explored by someone, if only to bring dub music out of the rut it's now in.

On another level, there's the Studio 1 syndrome. At the moment, Coxsons has the best set of musicians working away in his Brentford Road studios, occasionally creating new music, more usually overdubbing the old classics for immediate release. Only rarely do we hear the new work — the Studio 1 policy is "why release the new rhythms (which everyone else will copy and earn off) when you can over-dub and re-release the old classics (which everyone copies anyway) at less cost and a higher profit?"

The real shame of the situation is that the punters lap it up — never before have the consumers demanded stagnation so forcefully. On to the reviews...

PRE-RELEASE

Hottest pre of the week happens to be from Studio 1, the new one from Judah Eskender Tafari (real name Ronald Merrill) titled 'Rastafari Tell You'. Not quite as good as his 'Jah Light' classic but certainly near it, and a long way ahead of other Studio 1 releases in recent weeks. For those who haven't checked them yet, they mainly consist of overdubbed versions of 'Ting A Ling', from The Heptones, Silvertones, and a new Jazbo cut. Pablove Black's 'Chaunting Dread' is a vastly over-produced version of 'Sweet Talking'. If you want a Coxsons instrumental go for the master's (Jackie Mittoo) latest, 'Armageddon Time' on the new 'Stine Jao' label.

Best toasting tunes around are Nigger Kojak's 'Penitentiary' on his own label and Welton Irie's 'Bill Fold Wa You Fa' on Thrillseekers. I personally prefer Irie's style, and it's a catchy cut to Barrington Levy's popular 'A Yeh We Deh', but the dubs are pleasant enough on both singles. For singing fans, Rod Taylor's 'If Jah Should Come Now' is wholeheartedly recommended — the rhythm is nice, and the dub (Belva is only spoilt by the horrid syn-drums, although if you like syn-drums they'll probably make the tune for you). Sugar Minott's 'Rame', on the Black Roots label, is another one well worth checking out.

On the vinyl-wasting 12" scene Dennis Brown covers his own excellent 'In His Own Way' for Gussie Clarke on a no-expense-spared production, although Big Youth's toasting section is somewhat unnecessary. I certainly preferred it to Augustus Pablo's 'Crucial

Burial', possibly one of the most average records ever made. Everyone else has covered the classic 'Funeral' rhythm, and everyone has heard Pablo do it before (on the atrocious 'It's Dub' album)

so why bother with it again? RELEASED MUSIC The most entertaining release for me has been Paul Whiteman's 'I Don't Want To Lose You' (Santle), a record I failed to pick up when I heard it in '75. At the time it just seemed like 'another Tubby's version', and I left it in the shop in favour of the latest Pablo productions and a couple of Bunny Lee's flyers. Now it's been spliced (not very well) on a 12" 45, and at last I can enjoy the song and the excellent, if rather dated, dub. The other side features a horrible Roman Stewart outing, redeemed by Pablo's 'Columbo' version in the second half.

Still with Pablo, Dub Vendor records have a follow-up to Leroy Smart's 'Pride & Ambition', another old but gold Gussie production 'Classical Illusion'. Those who know it will remember it as Pablo's cut to 'Guiding Star', a duet with the anonymous gypsy violinist that Gussie used so well in those days. The B-side features Pablo again, a rare cut to the 'No No No' rhythm entitled 'Origan Style' (Scream Pablo!) — well worthwhile, and an indispensable addition to anyone's collection.

Morace Andy has two discs out at the moment, the most popular being the Taper Zukie production 'Natty Dread A Weh She Want' (Jet Star), the other being the less catchy, but more insistent 'Pura Ranking' (Sufferer's Heights) a King Tubby's prod, no less. The A-side features an additional dub cut to the rhythm, giving thirteen minutes of music on that side, while on the flip Trevor Ranking does his best with Augustus Pablo's (him again!) '555 Crown St.' dub work-out.

One of reggae's great unknowns Earl Zero, is definitely suffering from over-exposure at the moment — apart from his excellent revival of 'Please Officer' ('... you carry more guns than an aircraft carrier... in the wink of an eye, their rifles were in my nose...') on Sufferer's Heights, Greensleeves

Records have released the Soul Syndicate productions of two of his old classics 'Righteous Works' and 'City Of The Week Heart'. Both are apparently from an LP of Earl Zero's songs and although it's nice to see someone of Zero's class getting some recognition I don't think China's doing him any favours with the music — the whole thing sounds over-produced.

Greensleeves' other new disc, the commercially-titled 'Ethiopian Inflation' by Blood Relatives & Idrén does nothing to stop the dub backlash which is sure to come to a head soon. The disco-dub features four cuts of little-known rhythms, all boringly mixed — in all a great disappointment, especially after reading the names of the musicians crammed onto the label in an attempt to sell the record by anything other than the contents of the grooves.

And on to Lover's Rock... the best examples of which can be found on the Inner City label. The Investigator's 'Turn Out The Light', and on the K&K label, 'Princess' by The Albions. This is the sort of music which has given reggae in Britain the shot in the arm it needed, in the same way (and at much the same time) as punk did for white youth. Apart from the obvious best-selling artists such as Louisa Marks, Janet Kay, Matumbi, etc there are dozens of little bands and singers trying to do something to improve the standards of Jamaican-based music in this country, and many of them are succeeding to the point where British Lovers' Rock is outselling the harder, rootier and more often than not uninteresting JA product. If you've previously thought of UK-produced reggae as 'un-hip' or whatever, why not try actually listening to some of it — you could be pleasantly surprised.

NORMALITY IS BREAKING OUT ALL OVER

"I PROBABLY sent some two hundred copies of tapes to about two dozen record companies over a period of seven years," says Tom Scholz, leader of Boston.

"With that many rejections, I decided that my music wouldn't have much of an audience, and if I did ever get to make a record, it wouldn't sell many copies.

In the event, of course, Boston's first album in 1978 went double platinum in the States, selling twice as many copies as any other previous debut. The single from the album, 'More Than A Feeling', was also a big hit round the world.

Equally significantly, it could be argued that Boston established a new style of melodic heavy rock that a whole series of bands adopted, from Foreigner downwards.

Needless to say, many found it easy to assemble the ingredients, but few managed to get the mixture just right in the way that Boston did.

So Tom, what's your advice to young bands faced with record company indifference? Stay confident?

"No, I can't say that you should have confidence. I never did. I was always resigned to failure. The record business is finicky and difficult to get into.

"If you go into it with the idea that you're gonna be a success, that you know it's gonna happen — and I've seen many kids with that outlook — then somewhere along the line, when you're 35 or 40, it's gonna dawn with you that you've wasted your whole life.

"You should really take the attitude that you're not gonna get a contract. If you do get a contract, the record is not gonna sell. If it sells, it's not gonna last.

"You should really take a pessimistic view, because then if something does happen, it's really a pleasant surprise."

Pessimism as a working philosophy?

"It has to be. Failure would be so devastating if you took any other attitude."

TOM SCHOLZ is tall, lanky, long-haired and bespectacled. He looks like a cleaned-up Joey Ramone, but presumably he's a lot brighter. Tom's a graduate of MIT, and he's got a Masters Degree in Mechanical Engineering. MIT is the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, America's top academic centre for the sciences. Mechanical Engineering is... What's Mechanical Engineering, Tom?

"Nobody seems to know that in Europe," says Tom. "I guess you must call them something else. What would you call someone who designs new cars or cameras or a machine that was gonna make cans?"

I've no idea.

"Well, whatever you call them, mechanical engineers are engineers who design structures and mechanisms, and the training is everything from stress and strain — so you know where it's gonna break — to dynamics — so you know how it's gonna bounce."

Amazing the things you can learn talking to rock stars. Anyway, the point is that Tom did not want to spend the rest of his life considering where things break or how they bounce.

So at weekends, he shut himself in his basement, built a 12 track recorder, and pursued his real ambition of getting out of the laboratory and into the spotlight. Beneath the white coat, the spirit of rock'n'roll was fighting to get out, or at least politely asking to be excused.

FOUR YEARS after Boston got their record contract, Tom and his band were in London on the last leg of their first European tour, and to the surprise of many, they sold out the Rainbow for five consecutive nights.

"I'm surprised," says Tom. "I don't know how we sold so many tickets, because we don't sell that many records here."

What makes it even stranger is that Boston hardly fits in Britain's present mainstream, dominated by younger, less conservative bands.

"It was like that when we first started in the States disco was just coming on and everybody was saying — boy — we'd have a tough time with rock'n'roll. I thought: great. Just as we're getting a deal, there's a big musical move afoot and nobody'll come to the shows."

"But — lo and behold — there were millions of steadfast, traditional rock'n'roll fans. I think the same thing's happened here."

"I'm not very familiar with current English bands, but to my knowledge, there aren't any straightforward rock'n'roll bands doing the sort of thing that we're doing."

"I have a hunch that there's a lot of people who want to see something they can't get over here."

"Anyway, we brought the whole thing over with us — production intact — at a lot of expense. We didn't want to do anything cut-rate."

IN LONDON, Tom stayed at a discreet hotel evidently designed for visiting Americans, close to Marble Arch. The bar snack menu offers club sandwiches, and the sort of prices the British lay on tourists. Coffee and tea are 70p, Guinness 65p and Lowenbrau £1.50.

In the lobby, the only English voices are those of the porter and desk clerk.

Still, Boston are very much into tourism themselves. The singer Bradley Delp says he's taken so many rolls of film in Europe, he's not sure his salary will cover it. I think he's joking.

The bass-player Fran Sheehan says he collects match-books from every hotel he's ever stayed at, and he pins them on a globe at home.

"Maybe one day," he says, "I'll strike one of the matches and set fire to the whole thing."

The man who razed the world. Meanwhile, when I phone through to Tom's room, a youthful-sounding female says: "This is his mother. I'm sorry, but I don't know where he is at the moment."

Eventually, I meet Tom in the lobby, and he says his mother hasn't had a proper chance to see London before, so he's brought her over.

There can't be many rock stars who take their Mum on tour with them but then Boston don't exactly conform to the hard-living macho stereotype. Tom's voice even tends to suggest the veteran Hollywood star James Stewart playing an elderly professor.

In terms of the sheer scale of their show, though, Boston go in for the sort of excessive spending that will be seen as all too typical of American grossness.

The biggest item in their equipment is the world's biggest transportable pipe organ, to give you that real cathedral sound, makes Keith Emerson seem pretty modest by comparison.

But isn't it a bit strange that the band are touring when they haven't got any new records to promote? The last was their second album, 'Don't Look Back', over a year ago.

"Well", says Tom, "We always do things backwards."

Presumably, though, there's an album in the pipeline?

"No," he says, not very concerned. "I haven't started on it yet. Haven't had time. Finished the last one in August last year and went on the road immediately."

"It's been practically non-stop since then. I had six weeks off this summer. My first vacation for five years. I had some ideas, but I didn't do any recording."

What did you do?

"All of the things I didn't do for the past five years, and did very sparingly for the five years before that."

Such as?

"I finished most of the requirements for my private pilot's licence. I made some progress on the design of my pet radio controlled airplane — it's a real high performance model. I'm still trying to get some of the bugs out of it. I also played basketball, tennis, golf, croquet."

You find the music business a bit of a treadmill?

"More than a bit of a treadmill. It is an awful treadmill."

... and it comes from Boston (normality capital of the world), the city which produced BOSTON (most normal group ever to come from Boston), BOB (Mr Outrageous) EDMANDS meets Tom Scholz, a normal master of mechanical engineering, who struggled against rejection to produce the most normal rock record ever and meet the most abnormal success. NORMALS ONLY READ ON...

■ From previous page

BEFORE I met him, I expected Tom Scholz to be a rather less relaxed character than he turned out to be. His publicity person Jenny Halsall had warned me that he wouldn't want to talk to the press before his London season, and I'd have to talk to the other guys in the band, instead.

In fact, Tom turned out to be very affable and perfectly willing to chatter on for some time, re-arranging his immediate plans to fit the interview in.

There was also the theory that Tom had had enough of Boston. That once he'd had his double-platinum album, he couldn't see much point in carrying on. But this turned out to be far from the truth.

Tom did admit that he didn't actually like the business of recording new songs, and very much preferred touring.

"Touring is a lot of work and a lot of headaches, but it's a lot more fun than hanging out in the basement, doing guitar overdubs."

Surely any kind of writer has to spend a lot of time working alone? "Yeah, too much, actually. In my case, it amounts to weeks on end, just working from when you get up to when you go to bed. It's very tedious. A very unenjoyable experience."

In the view of some critics, Tom's lack of enjoyment in the studio was perhaps reflected in Boston's second album, recorded under pressure when they were already a huge success. Its reception by reviewers and public alike was far less enthusiastic.

"Frankly," he says, "it wouldn't have mattered what it sold, it would have been tough to follow the first one. In my opinion, that was the best I could do at the time."

"I was happy with the second album. In other countries, it outsold the first one. Not in the States, of course. Nobody in the States is selling anything this year."

"In fact, we sold half as many of the second album as we did of the first, but we still outsold anything else on the label, and there are some real heavies on the label (Epic)."

"I don't blame the record. I like some of the songs a little better and I had a little more time to spend on the sound."

FOR MANY bands, a long gap between albums, combined with the reluctance to record of their main writer, would create a state of permanent crisis.

Not so with Boston.

The way Bradley Delp sees it is this: "Basically, you just have to trust that it'll come out right. We've had so much success already, how can you complain about whatever happens next?"

"We're really very fortunate that we have someone like Tom whose ideas are so well formed. He really knows exactly what he wants to happen."

Is the rest of the band overshadowed by Tom because he's the main writer and the producer?

"Not really. The rest of the band hasn't really written that much. I've had a couple of tunes on the albums, and I'm happy with that. My problem is that I have difficulty with the arrangements, and I tend to write more acoustic stuff that doesn't fit with the band."

When the first Boston album came out, it was seen very much as Tom Scholz's brainchild, with the rest of the band dismissed as puppets.

Brad Delp thinks that Boston's vigorous commitment to touring has now firmly established them as a live act.

The band may not have been finally gathered together until the first album was complete, but they'd all played together before in various bands.

In Brad's case, he says he's known Tom since the end of the sixties. While Tom was at MIT, Brad was working with technology elsewhere.

"The Hot Watt Incorporated was the name of the factory," he says. "They made heating elements for everything from air-conditioners to coffee machines."

"I did everything there from general gopher work — go for this, go for that — to working on a metal lathe and soldering."

Brad explains that the only reason he worked there was to provide himself with enough money to exist until he got a recording contract.

"At times, I came close to despair. I remember when I was 24, all the bands that seemed to be getting contracts were 19 and 20."

Do you share Tom's view that it's best to be pessimistic?

"I think it's best to be realistic, though at times that's pretty well the same thing."

Brad Delp looks very much the archetypal American rock star. With his Zapata moustache and long bushy hair, he could also be mistaken for a plainclothes infiltrator from the drug squad.

He says his interest in music started when he was 12 and the Beatles first came out. He soon found that Boston was a bad place for a would-be rock star to live.

To succeed, says Brad, a band like J Geils had to go and establish themselves in Detroit before they gained any recognition.

He thinks now, though, that the success of Boston, and the other big act from the city, Aerosmith, have opened things up and allowed relative newcomers like The Cars to get somewhere.

One criticism that's easily directed at Boston is that their music seems calculatedly commercial. Enough rock'n'roll in it to make the over-20s feel they're still youthful, but not too much so they're scared off.

Tom Scholz says, however, that he's never deliberately tried to go for what he thought would be readily popular.

"I realised that was a bad way to go early on. When I first started doing demos, I realised the only thing I could do was to try to write music I enjoyed because it was the only thing I was going to do really good, the only thing I was going to have a feeling for."

"So that's what our music is: all the sounds I like enough not to throw in the waste bin when all the record companies rejected them."

"I don't think that any record I would ever write can come close to selling as much as 'Saturday Night Fever', for example. I'm not writing that type of music. I'm committed to rock'n'roll, and that's bound to have a limited audience."

Woyzeck fails to impress the 'drum-major'...

Beneath The Underdog

Woyzeck

Directed by Werner Herzog
Starring Klaus Kinski and Eva Mattes (Contemporary)

HOWEVER you take or leave it, this is a sad, sobering tale.

A bullied, downtrodden private in a nineteenth century Prussian garrison town, Woyzeck is the latest straggler in Werner Herzog's shuffling column of dissident anti-heroes: another little big man, another fragile human axis on which the world turns and turns again with appalling, insufferable weight.

The film is Herzog's tenth, and one of his most direct. A straightforward adaptation of a fragmentary play by Georg Buchner, it could just as easily have been an original Herzog script; Buchner's gently anarchic sense of the absurd and his quietly despairing fatalism mirror Herzog's uncannily.

A drunken yokel delivering philosophical profundities from a pub table top; a quack doctor putting his patient on a diet of peas and dropping a cat from a window to prove obscure metaphysical points; an officer musing portentously on the passing of time whilst he's being shaved dangerously close by a distracted Woyzeck; a man and his 'astronomical' horse pulling entire sheepskins over the eyes of their audience at a fair; any of these scenes could have been spliced from almost any of Herzog's previous films.

Similarly the progression from Stroszeck, the young German soldier in Signs Of Life, Herzog's debut, who flips out on a wartime Greek island and holds a whole garrison at bay with fireworks, to Woyzeck, who hears 'voices' on the wind and beneath the earth, is easily plotted: Herzog has always rooted for characters who have a certain amount of trouble with what is commonly defined as reality and whose supposed madness may actually be no more than an expression of utter sanity in an insane world.

Klaus Kinski, the megalomaniac conquistador of Herzog's Aguirre and more recently the melancholy Dracula in his Nosferatu, plays Woyzeck with complete commitment. Veins throbbing on his forehead, knuckles cracking, eyes constantly threatening to bulge out of their sockets, Kinski's Woyzeck is a man who seems to have stumbled on some awesome cosmic secret, but who lacks the wherewithal to communicate his discovery and remains bawled, haplessly trapped in the inane routines of military life.

There would be method in Woyzeck's mumbling and more than just a tenuous reason to believe in Marie (Eva Mattes), the prostitute mother of his child, if only he could subdue the rampant chaos inside his head. But he can't, and his turning to violence in a final, desperate attempt to exorcise his own inner demons is inevitable — at which point Herzog slews abruptly into slow motion, only prolonging the agony as he examines Kinski/Woyzeck's pained expression with frightening detachment.

Herzog isn't the disaffected high romantic he's made out to be. Although beautifully depicted, the film's historical setting is irrelevant, the gilt frame around an eternal condition. Too many societies still cramp too many minds and Woyzeck could really be anywhere, anytime; that's a small part of its substantial chill.

Bread And Chocolate

Directed by Franco Brusati
Starring Nino Manfredi,
Anna Karina
(CIC)

Bread And Chocolate is a comedy about a social problem — the plight of the immigrant worker. Nino (Manfredi) is a poor Italian trying to make money in rich, indifferent Switzerland. He begins as a waiter, competing for a permanent job with a belligerent Turk but after a little Fawltyesque slapstick — fish flying through the air, customers falling over — he gets the sack.

He's then employed by an unhappy millionaire (who selfishly kills himself on the morning Nino starts work), travels to a factory where a group of fellow countrymen indulge in an orgy of macho sentimentality and ends up with a handful of illegal immigrants who have a job killing poultry. After an extraordinary scene in which they all imitate chickens, then watch spellbound as the owner's children frolic naked in Aryan splendour, Nino dyes his hair blonde and tries to pass as a German. This guise fails when he becomes involved in an Italy versus Germany soccer international being televised in the pub.

Sour Suchard

Several times during the film, Nino tries to leave Switzerland. On each occasion he's greeted by a trainful of Italians strumming guitars and crooning ludicrously about the sun, the sea and how wonderful it is to be in Naples — all of which horrific sight strengthens his resolve to stay.

Finally, though, he gives up — "at least when you lose you get a rest" he tells the one friend he's made in Switzerland, a Greek political exile (Karina). Except, of course, at the last moment he changes his mind again and comes back for more.

Bread And Chocolate is often funny, has a superbly subtle performance from Manfredi and makes several telling points. But its flaws are equally significant. An alarming inconsistency of style and an insistent resort to cheap slapstick make for uneven entertainment. The film's real undoing, though, is Brusati's refusal to address the very political problem he raises.

By restricting the film to the level of a personal struggle — Nino's decision to stay in Switzerland is presented as the victory of individual courage in the face of adversity — Brusati reveals the essentially bourgeois nature of his vision. What kind of victory is it that merely entails further humiliation and exploitation?

The whole premise of the film — a person's struggle for dignity — is undermined by the fact that the only two options Brusati allows Nino both represent a loss of dignity. His situation is actually hopeless; and because he doesn't see this, his humanity is diminished. His determination becomes a delusion. Brusati chooses to overlook that hopelessness and instead concocts a cosy liberal fable about individual fortitude. He uses the ideology of bourgeois aesthetics to 'resolve' a situation which could only change through radical political action.

And that's why Bread And Chocolate is so unsatisfying and, ultimately, self-defeating.

LLOYD Beaney, The Tourists' manager, meets me in the foyer of the BBC Television Centre and whispers: "We'll have to smuggle you in. There's a new director doing the show and she's a bit paranoid about having the press around. If anyone asks who you are, say you're from the management company."

It's the work of a few seconds to adopt the authoritative mien of a management executive and, several corridors later, we stroll into Studio Six where The Tourists are recording two songs for this week's Multi-Coloured Swap Shop.

Studio Six is middle-sized as TV studios go. Banks of empty chairs slope down to the floor area, cluttered now with three tiny stages, a set of large, illuminated triangular structures and a bevy of cameras weaving and ducking around the central stage, presently occupied by The Tourists. Above, a bewildering array of lights and monitors flicker on and off.

Little happens. The cameras to and fro ceaselessly, perfecting their angles. The group yawn, scratch and squat on the stage, occasionally clicking into action to run through a mime of their last single 'The Loneliest Man In The World'. BBC types in smart casuals wander in and out exchanging greetings.

Two hours and four run-throughs later, the group are still on stage. Everyone is getting a little testy. Dave Stewart, Tourists' lead guitarist, has noticed an error in the last run-through. Ann Lennox had been told to sing into a camera that hadn't been in the right place.

"Can I speak to someone?" Stewart asks hesitantly. The technicians and cameramen bustling around the stage ignore him.

"Can I speak to someone?" he repeats. The director, in the control box at the back of the studio, is totally out of earshot.

Stewart gets the attention of the errant cameraman and explains what had happened.

"Listen son, you play in the group and I'll work the camera," he replies tartly. Stewart shrugs and gives up. The order comes down for a fifth run-through.

The pre-recorded tape begins; a swirling keyboards intro and Lennox's vocals: "There are no flowers in his house/There are no paintings hung on his wall..."

THIS IS a crucial time for the Tourists. Two appearances on TOTP failed to push their last single into the Top 30. Now, with a tour just beginning and a new single and a new album just released, they're hoping for some sympathetic press. Instead, they get me.

"There are a lot of things in our songs about truth 'n' reality 'n' suffering 'n' pain."

After the meal, I enquire about the new album 'Reality Effect'. Er, reality effect? Stewart: "It was my brother who thought of it. He works for the British Film Institute and he was telling me about this term they use in film called 'reality effect'."

"It's like a film might be set in the middle of the desert and all you see on the screen is the reality the producer wants you to see, but behind it are all the cameras and lights and things."

Lennox: "So it's the effect of reality."

Stewart: "And that's what we're trying to create in the music, that kind of effect. Rather than a distorted reality, like a glitter-band or a superstar thing. It's meant to be a straight-ahead music."

Ah, I see, but I'm bemused by all this talk of reality. I thought The Tourists were a pleasant, competent but quite, er, ordinary pop group.

Lennox: "Well, it's got that pop feel to it. It's got melody and it's got beat."

Coombes: "I wouldn't say the content was pop-orientated. It's not aimed at grandmothers or aunts in the traditional sense of popular."

Lennox: "Pop's a good medium if you want to communicate something, cos it's so accessible."

Stewart: "I think it's a lot more subtle myself, to use a pop medium to communicate. Not that we sit down and think about it, we just play and it comes out like that."

Gosh, natural genius! "Cos if you have lyrics that mean something with a lot of clanging noises," he muses, "then not many people will listen to it."

Well, so much for punk. But tell me.

Tourists, what exactly is it you're trying to communicate? Coombes, who writes nearly all the lyrics, ponders this.

"Honestly," he concludes. "And to be truthful to yourself and, er, come to terms with things."

Hmm. Could you perhaps explain this further.

Coombes: "A lot of people have said that my songs are depressing, like Leonard Cohen's, cos the lyrics deal with things like dying and the, er, obviousness of it, that you've gotta die."

Leonard Cohen huh? I'd have placed The Tourists closer to The Records or Tommy James And The Shondells. Even Coombes can't see the Cohen connection.

"I think I'm optimistic rather than pessimistic in the sense that there are a lot of things in the songs about truth 'n' reality 'n' suffering 'n' pain, but I'm not saying commit suicide or anything but, sort of, feel it and, er, do something with it. It's a search, really. Like trying to be truthful."

Oh. Well, which songs actually deal with dying?

Coombes: "There's one song on the new album, 'All Life's Tragedies' which is, er, vaguely about death."

"On most of the songs, it's not so much death, it's more of an abstract reality sort of thing."

Ah. Er, abstract reality?

Coombes: "I couldn't say that a song is about such and such a person or about something I saw somebody do or something I read in the paper. Nothing specific like that. Just a feeling of, er, life jangled all together coming out in a, er, formed but formless type of way. So you just get the feeling that something's being said, but it's very abstract."

There's an awkward silence. Coombes mutters unhappily, "It's hard to explain the abstract."

The rest of the group gallantly rally round.

Stewart: "It's like Peet assimilates all his experiences and then puts them down in a musical form."

Lennox: "There's one song where he's talking about confusion, and it's like an admission that he's confused."

Y-E-E-E-S?

Lennox: "And he says that some days he's happy and other days he isn't."

Whew! I can see we're getting down to the nitty gritty of existence here.

Lennox: "So he isn't saying 'Yeah everything's great,' and he isn't saying, 'Everything's absolutely awful.' He's just saying that we live in this reality nowadays and we're all experiencing all these things and, er, most of the time we're confused but it's alright cos we're all in the same plight. More or less."

Well, that's a relief.

Stewart: "It's like, did you listen to that track 'It's Good To Be Back Home Again'? That sounds very poppy, but it's also another honest emotion. Cos it is good to be back home sometimes."

"It definitely is," Coombes mutters disconsolately.

I'm beginning to think we should change the subject, but Lennox has become quite agitated.

"I'm depressed now. I think the press have always misunderstood us."

Stewart: "A lot of people in the music press seem to think what we're doing is just mainstream pop. I think we're a bit too subtle for them."

Yes. That must be it. Now...

"We're not about fashion," Lennox continues urgently, "we're not about being a cult, we're just about being human beings on this planet singing songs to people."

Wonderful. Now...

Lennox: "And, like, there must be social statements coming out and some of them could be interpreted as political, but they're not necessarily political. There isn't much of a stance in our music."

Coombes hastens to agree. "No, in the songs I've never tried to write in a stance or my personal point of view. I have got personal points of view, but I don't think you should use them in music. There's no point in writing down, I believe in this or you've gotta do that."

Ah, but even that is a personal point of view, I say. The very omission of a stance in your music is itself a stance. But Coombes doesn't seem to understand.

"But I'm only saying that cos I'm talking to you," he explains earnestly. "I mean, I've never written a song saying 'I'm not gonna tell you what to do.'"

Not? Fine. Great. This is the essence of democracy: everyone can have a point of view as long as they keep it to themselves. Let's talk about the tour.

Is this your first tour as headliners, Tourists? Lennox: "No, we did a low-key tour of all the toilets in the country."

Stewart: "It was a tour of all the clubs. Our roadies called it 'The Grief Tour' cos they kept getting all these tiny staircases which they had to cart the equipment up. And at one place, the floor really was like a toilet."

Jim Toomey, the group's drummer, who's said precisely nothing during the interview, concludes thoughtfully "That tour was worth going through, though. It was bad for the stomach but good for the head."

BACK in Studio Six, The Pretenders are on stage waiting for the final take of 'Kid'. The empty chairs are now filled by an audience of pre-pubescent weenies, who have two comers exuding false bonhomie to entertain them between songs.

The Tourists, now in their stage gear and make-up, have been rejoined by bassist Eddie Chin. Chin somehow forgot to bring his bass to the run-throughs and was dispatched to fetch it while the others were being interviewed.

The Pretenders do their bit and file away. The Tourists get ready for their big moment. I miss it.

Forgotten I'm supposed to be a management executive, I blow my cover and am escorted off the premises as "unauthorised personnel". As I leave I hear the comers working on the audience again.

"Is there anything you'd like to ask about the show or Noel Edmonds or about ourselves?" enthuses one.

"Yeah," pipes a voice from the back. "ow often d'ya change yer socks?"

THE TOURISTS talk about committing suicide. GRAHAM LOCK hopes they will.

Why a pop band isn't happy anymore

each week reading Ronnie Biggs, John Travolta and stuff — purely people who've inhabited the headlines.

Biggs is actually less impressive than he should be. You go out there expecting to find some big bandit character hanging out, bandana and hairy chest and stuff, but he's actually quite a normal South London guy. He's regressed a bit being out there. It was very strange how well he got on with Steve Jones and Paul. They had exactly the same kind of background, the same kind of humour.

His main purpose in terms of the Sex Pistols story was his role as a media figure. The legend of Ronnie Biggs was all that really mattered. You don't really want to know how he feels in Brazil, that wasn't important to us. What was important was the image of the Great Train Robber and prison escapes singing with the band who'd swindled their way to the top.

BY THIS stage, after the whole American thing, Sid was in a bad way and he was going to Paris and we thought we'd film him. Sid was very difficult there because he was very ill and he had Nancy with him who was very, very difficult to have around. I mean if we went out for a day filming with him, he'd come back in the evening and she'd be lying on the bed with a pool of blood next to her where she'd cut her wrists with a glass. She was in that kind of state. They were fighting all the time and it was very difficult.

One of the main problems was we'd happened to choose as a location for most of the stuff the old Jewish ghetto area of Paris Sid was wearing his swastika T-shirt and it did provoke really violent reactions from the local inhabitants there. Old women would come up to the cameramen in tears saying, "What are you working with this thing for?" As a result, the camera crews were very strained by this.

Sid was very ill and we had to stash him in a hotel, set up the shot outside the door, drag him out, do the shot, pull him back in, do another set up, drag him out — which is a very difficult way of filming.

The cameramen were very unhappy about doing the whole thing, especially with knives and things like this on the streets. One cameraman said, "I've been in the Congo. I've been in Vietnam, I've been everywhere but I've never had such a problem as Sid Vicious. The Vietnam War was nothing."

"Dear Maria, I keep getting these dreams that I'm a pop group manager..."

AFTER PARIS we had the single 'My Way' and we really started to sit down and try and work out the ideas for the film. Malcolm and I spent a long time locked away, coming out with various different ideas; we had one complete script that got thrown out. We spent the first part of the summer doing that and by August we were ready to film. Well, we weren't really ready but we thought we'd better film or we'd never get it done.

We didn't really have the experience of making a large-scale film and there wasn't much money. Part of the deal with Warners when they signed the band as a recording act was to put up money for the making of a feature film. That money was an interest-free loan. It was a large amount of money, but it was mainly eaten up by the pre-production costs of the Meyer film and paying Meyer and paying off the crew who had been hired. It's a bit murky, the money side of it, because that's what Johnny Rotten's case was about.

The money kept kind of drying up and Malcolm would go out and score more money and we could film a bit more. He certainly raised money from Virgin and from Don Boyd as a finishing cost but mainly the thing that was subsidised by Malcolm's money and the group's money. I'm not really clear. I'm not the person to talk about that really, how the finance was done. It was totally chaotic whatever the situation was.

We did a solid block of filming in August/September but then Sid went to America and things were dictated very much by events. By this stage the pressures were really building up on Malcolm with Sid's murder thing, and the ideas kept changing.

Malcolm wanted to change everything. Things that had already been shot, he wanted to try and edit them into something else, and film new stuff based on that premise. He kept ringing up from America with more editing plans. We did a final bit of shooting in January based on the series of changes that had gone on through the autumn. Then the Receivers were called in when Rotten sued Malcolm, the process came to an end and we just edited it — though Malcolm wasn't involved anymore.

ONE OF the things that I thought — because we had so many different types of film like Super 8, video — that it would be nice to be as anarchic as possible in the type of film medium that we used.

The thing that sparked off the animation, although it was partly the idea of diversifying the look of the film as much as possible, was we wanted to get something in about Meyer and the famous incest scene that was one of the big problems on the Meyer film. The obvious way to do that was with a cartoon, to set up a Disney-type situation but with characters like Sid Vicious instead of Snow White. We did do this cartoon which, again, we were not able to use. Of Meyer directing Sid and his mother in this incest scene. But from then on we decided to use cartoon to show some of the incidents that the group had been through.

You must at some stage have asserted yourself as director and developed the shape of the film.

Yeah, I did that during the shooting in the summer. Initially Malcolm and myself were working very closely and were very sympathetic in terms of what we were doing but it was a really strange film because it was determined so much by events.

If every film was like that I wouldn't bother doing a film because what you really need is a script that you start off with. It's an anchor and if you want to change it you change it, but you know where the hell you are. We were going through so many fluctuations in what we were doing and what we could do, that it was very difficult to impose a structure on it — other than the idea we had of presenting the thing as a swindle manipulated by a mad mastermind manager. We did settle on that at a certain point and stick with that.

Really I would say I could only assert what I wanted to do with what I had when Malcolm had stopped saying, "Let's do this this week." I mean it was his money, it was his project and, although we had worked very closely together, ultimately his were the decisions.

I think, in a funny way, it does reflect the pace of the history of the group and the anarchic nature of the group in a surprisingly accurate way. I do think it's very much a film about the Sex Pistols attitude — which is a very unique attitude, and one I don't think people have really understood.

I think that was about a form of cultural terrorism. It was a total attack on show business and the way in which show business and people's leisure time conditions what they think. How people enjoy themselves seems to be more and more important in a political sense.

The Sex Pistols were a definite intervention in that scheme of things. The enemy that it was directed against was initially the record business, but it had to keep changing, once there was a danger of The Sex Pistols being a kind of celebrated cause for Time Out liberals. It was important to attack them as well because what the Sex Pistols were about was never being predictable, never being smug.

Other mainstream political acts like Tom Robinson or The Clash have this terrible smugness about their position, that this is black and white and we're on the right side and you're on the wrong side.

I don't think punk rock, in the real meaning of the thing, was anything to do with that. It was being nihilistic in a way, but it was there to shock people into realising certain things about what kids feel and what life is about. I think England is obscene in its stagnant kind of culture, the whole cultural feeling is morbid and incestuous. Punk rock was a great electric shock in the middle of that.

There's been a lot of real criticism from people saying it was just Malcolm selling out and making money and all this kind of thing. But what it was, really, was a move to cut the ground away from the people who were trying to build up The Sex Pistols into some kind of perfect, naive, innocent expression of punk rock. There was a definite change in the liberal media representation of punk from total abhorrence at the beginning, saying, "Oh God, they can't play" until it became very acceptable to like The Sex Pistols and to think Johnny Rotten was a saint amongst men.

The Rock'n'Roll Swindle idea was to say that the whole thing was just a swindle and that we conned everybody in the way that any other recording star conned people into buying their records. The Sex Pistols used that mechanism, but want to point out that that's what it was — which is like exposing the seams of the thing and not worrying whether they're ugly or nasty, 'cause they are, they always are.

So you think that McLaren's real achievement was in manipulating the media?

Well, I think that shows the way ahead really. A sit-in at a college, a demonstration doesn't do that much. A folk singer in a club or The Clash singing about the White Riot only really gets through to a few hundred people in a hall or a few thousand people who read NME. If you can get through using the mass media that exists, your message doesn't have to be that explicit. If you can intervene and shock people and make that number of brains think about a certain thing, you're going to get a lot more interesting results than standing up and preaching to a few virtually converted people.

The whole history of the Left since the War has been very much one of telling people that this is right and this is wrong; it hasn't been actually throwing the initiative onto people themselves.

The mass media, which is obviously very carefully controlled, can be infiltrated in the way The Sex Pistols did, in order to make people think.

I THINK kids, because of The Sex Pistols, know a lot more about the structure of the record business than they ever knew before. They know the deals that have been done, the money that's been made, and the power that people have behind that bit of plastic that they're buying, in a way that they never knew before. That has been not by The Sex Pistols preaching. It's been by making kids interested and thinking for themselves. What excited the kids really, more than anything else I think, was the headlines. Each front-page headline was as good as a Number One record, and that's a fact.

Malcolm didn't originally want to be the rock and roll manager acting the ten lessons, but he certainly did get into it and developed it a lot. The idea was to blow out of all proportion the myth of him that had been around in the music press as some kind of manipulator and try and make him boastful and arrogant, claiming that he'd planned it for ages. And that the whole thing was just a con trick on everybody in order for people to try and put The Sex Pistols swindle up against their knowledge of the music business.

The rock and roll business is swindling people every day. Every time someone goes into Virgin Records they're being swindled, as far as I'm concerned.

With this film it seems that the battle The Sex Pistols fought with the recording industry is now just moving to another quarter — to the film industry.

Well, it is part of the same thing, isn't it? They're both spectacles that are used to entrance people usually.

It seems now that the film business is beginning to come under attack in the same way that the record companies were in the '60s. The film business in this country is run by old men with cigars but there's a lot of young directors, actors and so on who want to break through that system, and a lot of new wave bands getting into making films. Do you see any kind of parallel between the two situations?

I think there is a parallel. I don't think it's too weighty though because the main thing in the film business is that the villains of the piece are the distributors and exhibitors and the people who have made vast amounts of money out of the film business, the people who've sold out to America.

The young/old thing I'm not sure about because a lot of these supposedly young people are from the '60s. I certainly couldn't back them against the guys who've been working at Ealing and who've really done some good stuff. It's not quite as simple as Old Wave versus New Wave. There's been a criminal neglect of very able and interesting people who have been unable to work. I think that older way of making films is probably superior to that of the '60s people.

I don't know about new wave bands. I hate films about bands. The reason that I wanted to make a film about The Sex Pistols was that, for me, they weren't just a rock and roll band, they were far more interesting than that. I think music in films is great, but without a really good context for it I don't like it because I think music itself is better than the film version of the music.

Finally, what part of the film do you like most, or comes closest to what you were trying to achieve?

I really like the bit where Sid shoots the audience, especially singing 'My Way'. It's a very good example of The Sex Pistols' attitude. Especially given Sid's character as a kind of social actor, or whatever he was, with the annihilation of that song. To me it is tremendous. All the egoism and the individualism and the hypocrisy involved in that song and the audience lapping it up and getting shot to pieces is just wonderful to me.

THE FIRST PORTABLE TO REALISE NO SYMPHONY WAS EVER WRITTEN FOR

If the idea of 45, 60 or 90 minutes of non-stop Beethoven – or Elvis Costello for that matter – is what turns you on, this is the machine for you.

When your cassette reaches the end of one side, it automatically reverses itself, without any help needed from you at all.

And it happens whether you're just playing back, or recording.

This auto-reverse mechanism is not entirely new, of course. But it's the first time you'll find it on a portable stereo cassette radio.

The RT 8560S is sophisticated in many other ways, too.

It has two microphones, so it records in stereo as well. From the FM radio waveband, turntable, or live music.

And, like all the best speaker systems, it uses more than one drive unit per channel, with a separate tweeter and mid/bass unit on each side.

The output is an impressive 5W per channel, there are 4 wavebands, and all the extras you'd expect, including cue/review device, stereo-wide switch and three position tape selector.

Take a look at the RT 8560S and our other radio cassettes (including the mono auto-reverse model, the RT 6510) at your local Toshiba dealer's. You'll be surprised at how much quality we've packed into portables.

MAX BELL taps a toe to the sound of singles

THE SHOES

Present Tense (Elektra)
COME the last dim flicker of '79, when the great rock and roll Ready Reckoner chalks up the odds and predicts the sparring partners whom it deems worthy to sniff the first wispy slipstream of a new decade, the predominant common denominator of the last ten years of grace will undoubtedly be seen as the return of pop, as in popular music.

The fact is, whatever way you turn the beast, it's the pop stuff that people eventually hark back to, and 1979 has seen a revival of the necessary market and the desire to satisfy it with something approaching modern (ho hum) perfection. Nearly any band worth its salt wants to be on the radio again and damn nigh all of them are prepared to dilute their message accordingly. The airwave mentality, the sound of singles, is a passport to success for everyone from Elvis Costello to The Knack and back again via The Clash and Cheap Trick.

Now I didn't say it was all good — actually the majority of our new heroes are empty dullards forced into an area of productivity quite alien to their talents. Only a few lone souls have both the nous and the ability to turn dreams into listenable plastic, and even then it's never too long before the original fizz and sparkle dissipate.

This is particularly evident in the old US of A. In the land of a thousand dances you gotta have a gimmick to pass muster with the big boys' bucks — either that or sink into a well loved but heavily ignored obscurity.

The Shoes are one group in a million who defy form and call their own shots. Their official debut, 'Black Vinyl Shoes', recorded by four kids in a bedroom, was rightly heralded as a '70s yardstick, a breath of fresh air in a cynical kitchen. When the majors finally woke up to its existence, it was only fitting that Elektra should ink the pact that would take the group from their hometown Zion, Illinois to Babylon, England. Of all the '60s labels Elektra was the company to maintain an individual aesthetic. Now it's enjoying a rebirth of sorts, and one hopes that The Shoes will spearhead a revival.

'Present Tense' is a record which defies expectations. Anyone who suspected that The Shoes' opening salvo was an accidental stroke of genius is in for a pleasant surprise. The band have co-opted producer Mike Stone to guide them through the pitfalls of the studio but haven't sacrificed one jot of their unique sound or their ratio of stone melodic brilliance.

Instrumentally this group is several rungs higher than the nearest competition and their basic two guitars, bass and drums line-up ridicules the notion that the formula is redundant. As songwriters the brothers Murphy — Jeff and John — and Gary Klebe have also finally quashed the myth that 1968 was a watershed by crossing the gulf from innocence to worldliness and emerging quite unscathed.

Side one dispenses with some of their back pages, starting on 'Tomorrow Night', the single that brought them to prominence (ha ha) and a useful guideline to Shoes style with its subtle merging of addictive harmonies and disguised power chording. 'Too Late' and 'Hangin' Round With You' have also been sitting in the can for a year or so, but the formula hasn't tarnished. One reason for this happy state of affairs is that every Shoe can sing very prettily indeed, and the effect is akin to having three Robin Zanders on tap to flow seamlessly across a selection of material that equals the highpoints of Lennon and McCartney, early Townshend, and even McGuinn and his Byrds.

The Shoes are equally confident with unashamed romantic ballads (and it's here that some devotees of the band and myself disagree), but they circumnavigate allegations of sloppy wimpiness by virtue of the strength of those melodies and their perfect taste in execution.

'Three Times', a tale of related girl trouble in spades, is the one that polarises believers and dissidents. By the time the song reaches Gary Klebe's section I'm sold. Harpers Bizarre, all is forgiven.

Bassist John Murphy provides the album with its funniest, sexiest hookline in 'Cruel You' and Klebe with its nastiest put-down in 'I Don't Miss You', but it would be churlish to try and give a blow by blow account of who does what best. The Shoes' main attraction lies in them being a mature unit capable of delivering hard core pop with a fine understanding of the vintage while owing absolutely nothing to no one.

As it is, WEA might as well close down the presses and go home for the rest of the year — they don't need to release another record again. Ever.

THE BEATLES

Rarities (EMI)
DEPENDS what you call a 'rarity'. Due perhaps to the impending legals that would undoubtedly axe the output of unreleased Beatles material, demos or bootlegs, 'Rarities' turns out to be a slightly inflated pretext. The sole tracks previously unavailable in the UK are the German phrase-book versions of their two monster hit singles (guess which), 'Sie Liebt Dich' and 'Komm, Gib Mir Deine Hand'. Learn the words and be a Eurocrat.

All the same, the album's a tasteful selection, opening with George Martin's original production of 'Across The Universe' for a compilation called 'Nothing's Gonna Change Our World' put out by The World Wildlife Fund. Faster, sparser and with a deluge of harmonies, it comes replete with all the standard hippy embroidery — Granchester Meadows-type wildflower overdubs and a couple of drippy girl singers, allegedly roped in off the street for the session, who both sound like Mary Hopkin and quite possibly are.

There's also the relatively scarce but uninspired 'Long Tall Sally' EP, which comprises the title track, 'I Call Your Name', 'Slow Down' and 'Matchbox', the latter being an early vocal disaster by Ringo who manages to make the classic line 'If you don't want my peaches, honey, please don't shake my trees' sound like a peen to market gardening. If you want Beatles' rock 'n' roll, 'Live At The Hollywood Bowl' is raw, twice as rare, and you can bust a gut to the boys' on-stage banter.

The rest consists of B-sides — drawing just attention to the Beatles' 'experimental' use of same — some of which improve with age like the definitive barber shop/beast numbers 'Yes It Is' and 'This Boy'. Others don't fare quite so well in retrospect. 'You Know My Name' sounding like sub-'Gorilla' period Bonzos and Harrison's fearful 'Inner Light' coming over like a commercial for biryani.

I'm still holding out for an estate of Lennon's mid-'50s garage combo The Quarrymen. Till then, 'Rarities' makes for a painless way to pass the time.

UK

Night After Night (EG/Polydor)

MIXED from separate live recordings in Tokyo, 'Night By Night' is the latest waxing of three rock musicians of irreproachable sidekick pedigree. Their collective pasts encompass stints with Zappa, Roxy M., Curved Air, Family, and King Crimson, the latter's influence weighing most heavily here.

Until shortly before the Jap tour, UK operated as a four-piece group until their guitarist and original drummer fled the camp in a pique of artistic temperament. Which leaves Eddy Jobson (keyboards, electric violin), John Wetton (bass, voice), and newly-recruited Californian Terry Bozzio (drums) to fly the UK banner.

As if to compensate for the truncated line-up, the contribution of the keyboards is overstated to an absurd degree, emitting massive squalls of piped synthetic noise, while the bass lines boom and clatter like an erratic rugby ball in perpetual motion.

Derived from and severely limited to the 'progressive' early '70s aesthetic, this music is old boogie in new clothes: a set of doomy, apocalyptic, mutant HM shout ballads that condemns itself to a pitch of unusual ugliness.

MATUMBI
Point of View (EMI)
RATHER than attempt to spearhead a British acceptance of reggae in the early '70s, Matumbi set back and released smooth covers of soul standards and admittedly pressurised by the strict policy of their label, Trojan — left it to their JA counterparts to stake out a credible market.

Last year's 'Seven Seals' album, along with the eventual freedom of their EMI deal, showed the band defiantly keeping options open; the result was a precariously broad mix of Jahspeak lyrics, sturdy Anglo-reggae and even 'Empire Road', a TV soap-opera soundtrack.

Just to confirm that such width was a deliberate attempt to expand, rather than a meandering search for an easily compartmentalised direction, 'Point Of View' is sixed into two clearly separate sections. The first side's labelled 'One View'; the second 'Another View'; both deserve to be judged in their own context. A side of clear-cut, near-roots reggae gives way to a flip that uses every commercial device imaginable to try and wing Matumbi chartwards, the current rise of the title track single being proof enough that there's people out there prepared to buy it.

Side one consists of variously paced arrangements of the band's testcard; bluesy guitar, occasional but very Matumbi: seven men in search of a style.

Parallel points — mixed blessings effective blues harp, a chugging, rocksteady rhythm axis, bone-dry drumming, nudging bass, rich melodies and a sparse horn section filling in the cracks.

The most inspired tracks are re-runs of Jah ideology. Oppression features, thick with biblical reference, in 'Daughter Of Babylon' and then there's the more soulful and endearing 'Black Civilisation'. The rest tackle current social concerns like inflation, unemployment and even air pollution. The escapist 'Come With Me' and 'Bookie To The Bank' are two of several songs seen, almost self-consciously, through the eyes of a defensive British black. You're left feeling that Matumbi ideally want to strike a happy medium between ideology (overbearing) and observation (trite), but never quite hit the right balance.

In the same way, side two, with the exception of the turgid 'Judy McQueen', states five variations on a single style, this being an unlikely fusion of late '50s shoo-wop-era American pop balladry and smooth soul vocals, all laid over a percussive dub base which also flings wide the door for much studio embroidery — syndrums, synths, treated clavinets, voice-box, the works.

The single cut, 'Point Of View', is a rosy mush of big band bragginess — the nearest we're likely to come to a dub-Showaddywaddy — with the more sensitive shoo-wop fusion of the closing track, 'Living In A Dream', which (stronger still) sounds not unlike recent Isley Brothers. The stand-outs are Bovall's 'Ordinary Man', an elegant, poised romance, curiously arranged with a synth as part of the horn section and the album's finest track, Bevin Fagan's 'Boy Oh Boy' — a more delicate, lilting tribute to 'Keye' period Weathers you'd be hard pushed to find.

Matumbi make deliberate tracks to refine a reggae pop music, a worthy cause in my book, and one that's all too often inane dismissed as commercial roots dilution. Despite its sometimes veering the wrong side of safe and superficial, 'Point Of View' proves they're getting closer all the time.

THERE'S a whole pack of these fresh-faced Yankee boys jockeying for chart positions and practising that pop mop shimmy shake that will maybe catapult them to instant stardom. Amongst the up and coming heart throbs are The Beat, The A's, The Shoes and 20/20, decent citizens all with enough budding talent to go around an EP (Shoes excepted).

Like their peers, 20/20 try hard but don't get results often enough. 20/20 music ciphers through Who and McCartney with willing and little panache of its own. It sounds premeditated and sterile, songs without an audience to provide the yardstick. Sure everybody has to start somewhere but 20/20 started three years ago listening hard to Dwight Twilley and his partner Phil Seymour. They cut a fair Bomp single and have enlisted Earle Mankey (ex-Halfnelson and Pop and Dickies producer) to pull it into shape here.

On side one they struggle for an identity and don't find it until it's too late, on the astoundingly entitled 'Tell Me Why (Can't Understand You)'. There is another 'nice' song too called 'Yellow Pills' which is lyrically obtuse but melodically satisfying in a sub-psychodelic fashion. The rest is padding, fraught with old fashioned synthesiser and earnest posing ('The Sky Is Falling 7/79', 'Cheri').

Side two nearly makes their case for them with a breezy romp through the elements called 'Remember The Lightning' and 'She's An Obsession' where Phil Seymour does his modern Shelter person back-up to a tee.

20/20 are not yet stars, don't deserve to be whipping boys, might make the nut in spades some time. This debut is too conditional to demand your attention and just good enough in parts to have you sidling over to the cover and wondering.

MIKE BATT AND FRIENDS
Tarot Suite (Epic)

THE Friends include Colin Blunstone, Roger Chapman, Jim Cregan, Rory Gallagher, Chris Spedding, Tony McPhee, B. J. Cole, Mel Collins, Ray Cooper and The London Symphony Orchestra and — yep, you're right! — it's Mike Batt's first excursion into the world of the concept album.

Sometime ago he was responsible for 'Schizophrenia', an album that started life as a normal song set but ended as a fifty per cent concept job as Batt changed direction midstream. Not surprisingly it was somewhat flawed — though in toto it proved a well above average release. 'Tarot Suite', on the other hand, has been carefully conceived and has far more cohesion but, despite these attributes, fails to match 'Schizophrenia' in terms of general likeability.

Forget the Wombling jokes, Batt is a tremendously talented producer, writer and performer who's been associated with some of the most successful records made by The Groundhogs, Kursaal Flyers, Family and Steeleye Span. But often the media have refused to take his work seriously — which is why on 'Tarot Suite' he tries too hard to impress.

Much of the writing and production work is technically brilliant. However, there's too much striving for impact, too much pell-mell percussion and too many symphonic sorties. For once, Batt's work lacks humour and though there are moments of warmth — notably on the tender 'Losing Your Way In The Rain', which comes breathily and splendidly rendered by Colin Blunstone — the listener is often left reeling by the shock waves.

It's A Person's Life*ELKIE BROOKS Live And Learn (A&M)

I think the word we're all supposed to reach for here is 'classy'. Elkie Brooks' fourth album is as polished and perfectly boring as you'd expect of anything pitched so explicitly at the 'sophisticated' (read dead-) end of the comatose American market.

And I don't care if it was produced by the 'legendary' Leiber and Stoller (who, if we're honest about it, haven't done anything very legendary in years) or that it's made with the Tower of Power crew and other choice LA session men — these very talented people have also helped to make some of the more tedious records of this decade.

In Detroit they churn out automobiles; in California it's imitation soul music. So 'Live And Learn' just sort of funks its way along the same way as a million things before it. Elkie sings it all with the requisite professionalism — whether called upon to be tender or 'earthy' or slinky or whatever.

It's smooth, reassuring stuff; a mild substitute for wilder youth. You might be growing old, or comfortable and rich. But settle back late at night, turn the lamp-light way down low. And think of Elkie. And pretend...

BONNIE RAITT
The Glow (Warner Brothers)

WITH the lady's own compositions getting scarcer by the year, a Bonnie Raitt album tends to be only as good as what she borrows to colour her current musical leanings.

This is her seventh album since '72, when 'Give It Up' announced a rough versatility

Bonnie: "Some show, huh?"

Pic by Chaikie Davies

spanning from slide-guitar toting raunch-rock blues to a spine-melting cover of Eric Kaz's 'Love Has No Pride' that clearly dropkicked the Ronstadt version to kingdom come at a time when the latter had supposedly cornered the market.

'The Glow', while still maintaining that same width, steadies the gradual landslide towards smooth Californian taste that's been evident on her last few albums. She's still dipping into the West Coast song reservoir (Jackson Browne, etc), but now digging back to the mid-'50s/early '60s for a supply of bonafide rockers.

With songs kept sparse and subtle — played by a select session crew and neatly arranged by Feat's Bill Payne — the raunchier tracks come over thin, static and too consciously controlled. Hayes/Porter's 'I Thank You' just hasn't the weight to get across, Bobby Troup's 'The Boy Can't Help It' (remember the '60s 'female' version?) is stilted, and the few glimpses of Bonnie's slide playing on her only original cut 'Standin'

By The Same Old Love' show no signs of the original true grit.

By the same token, a tight, low-key, ordered backline makes a suitably rich and emotive setting for the kind of smouldering soul ballads that seem to creep into the Raitt repertoire in ever larger numbers. The immensely powerful 'Goin' Wild For You

Baby' closes the second side, hung around cold, distant synthesiser chords, and 'The Glow' concludes the first, spreading a gorgeous vocal line over a lazy, sagging string bass and stealthy banks of piano threaded with a shifting jazz drum undercurrent.

This being the title track, the album being produced by Peter Asher, and an almost seductive late-night snap adorning its back cover, we could be twiggling a change of direction here. Few others have the sheer class to get away with it.

LEO SAYER
Here (Chrysalis)

EVEN if his face were to break out in crimson swastikas and he did old Sex Pistol covers, Leo would always be loved by the nation's mums. You see, he's got that indigenous British trait that Dame Edna identified as... niceness. That's the word; Leo Sayer's new LP has got niceness.

But what it hasn't got is the instant jingle appeal of his earlier work. Instead, it reveals, if none too convincingly, Sayer's more sober side. As they run, the ten ballads fulfil their purpose by passing quality control without raising any questions. Side one co-opts the better songs, notably 'The End'. Sayer's answer to 'Won't Get Fooled Again', in which he is at his howling best, 'Lost Control' is scatty and ambiguous, like Mantovani playing Springsteen. 'An Englishman In The USA' has Leo stuck inside of Vegas with the Shoreham-by-Sea blues again.

Sayer is in the driver's seat, all is tickety-boo. His voice, as ever, is lovely and the session boys, who are rocky and modern, behave impeccably throughout.

Whatever mood or emotion his songs require, Sayer cannot help but sound melodramatic and detached. I suppose 'Here' is where Sayer wants to be: neither up nor down, left nor right, good nor bad, it teeters painlessly through a surface zone of entropic oblivion. The penalty of being nice.

Leather Report

MOTORHEAD Bomber (Bronze)

LIKE a death-throe dinosaur, blind with pain and rage; thrashing, crashing headlong on to tangled death in the primeval swamp. A roar and a din to curdle the very blood.

Cut to scene two. A suburban bedroom, youth slumped up against stereo. Expression glazed, twitch and gibber, dribble of blood from ears. Clutches fossil in one hand, 'Bomber' sleeve in other. A roar and a din...

Or a blasted rock-quarry crumbling, a war-rubbed Berlin bunker, or Culture's monument demolished, roughly dynamited. Or whatever you want, so long as it's desperate, demonic, heroically desolate, deafening. More than anything, deafening.

Aural assault, this is, relentless and unlovely; play it at the right volume and the neighbours won't bang on the walls, they'll pack up and evacuate. It's a pitiless music, and if you won't surrender to its brutal charms then it might just chew you up and spit you aside.

I mean, give us a break; it's really difficult to evaluate albums like 'Bomber' — reasoning seems futile, let alone analysis. Motorhead are the way they are because that's the way they are. Nobody stopped to ask King Kong if he was the product of a broken home.

You've surely made some acquaintance with the noise we know as Motorhead by now; if so then the present record will not disappoint your expectations one way or the other. If you've never experienced Lemmy & Co (and, let me whisper, ignorance often is bliss), then the above might give some kind of guide.

So what constructive comments might be offered of 'Bomber'? That 'Dead Men Tell No Tales' veers towards the clichéd, or that Philthy Animal Taylor's drumming lacks a little sensitivity? That

'Lawmen' and 'Sharpshooter' sacrifice subtlety for directness, resulting in a certain crudity? Well, we could say all that and more, but there isn't much point.

As total gross-out over-the-top HM power-trios go, Motorhead go further than anybody. Where others are just unpleasant, this lot are unbearable. They know what they're about, and they do their worst to prove it. So I leave Motorhead alone and hope they'll repay the favour. I'm even happy to see them do well: I just don't want to be in the vicinity while they're doing it.

I'll be happy if I never hear 'Bomber' again; in fact I'll be very pleased. There's a nice design around Bronze record labels; it shows an ape evolving into a walking man. Play a copy long enough and I swear it, the little man turns backwards and retraces his steps, back to prehistory. Maybe he'll meet that dinosaur.

MADNESS

One Step Beyond (Stiff)

HOT on the tail of fellow ska men The Specials, Madness release their debut album and prove that they have a style and distinctiveness of their own.

Like The Specials, Madness had a lot to live up to. With a reputation as one of the liveliest, craziest live acts around, playing infectious dance music "to the heat and the beat", compered by cartoon character/funny man Chas Smith, who introduces, demonstrates and entertains with his lightning footwork and cheerleader vocals, they had to prove that such spontaneous and natural communication could successfully be transferred onto inflexible, permanent vinyl.

But from Chas's familiar intro, "Hey you! Don't watch that, watch this..." and the surge of jostling saxophones, keyboards, guitars and percussion, you know that everything is going to be alright — because that is, and this is, "the nutty sound", defying you to resist its magnetic, charismatic beat.

Their most compulsive live numbers are also the most compulsive on record: 'Land Of Hope And Glory' with all its genial Bank holiday-in-the-pub feel, the alternative dance instrumental 'Swan Lake', their cap-doffing single to names and inspirer 'The Prince' (Buster), and 'Rockin' in A' with its sharp kid growing up, youth club, discos, birds, bikes and bands, cramming all the fun into one moment until it sounds about to burst with exhilaration and energy.

The songs are short, sharp and snappy, seven tracks a side with slower numbers such as 'My Girl', 'Believe Me' and 'In The Middle Of The Night' offering breathers as Suggs (Graham McPherson) tells assuming local tales with chirpy, colloquial humour. Here Madness sound like any good singalong pub band, Madness at rest.

Pic by Kerstin Rodgers.

but the tugging chords and sawing rhythms still nudge insistently, tickling the feet and bluntly demanding to be accommodated. There is a warm, easy familiarity about Madness, and none of the underlying cynicism of social comment of The Specials.

And the audience are just as much part of the album as the live show, their photographs, requested by the band, making a collage on the album's inner sleeve fronted by Madness's chosen four, gap-toothed, cloth-capped 'Prince Nutty' punter. Here is proof of the numbers and the varieties attracted — and affected — by Madness.

Prototype Madman Chas (backing vocals, assorted snouts and fancy footwork) does his best, as he does onstage, to disrupt any attempts at organisation, and fulfils that last contractual obligation on the back of the album cover, where he dances a series of snapshot pix of a ska Fred Astaire in action, clearly demonstrating each major dance movement, and its all important facial expression.

Essentially live, essentially active, Madness go 'One Step Beyond...' and bring you the first audio-visual aid to ska.

ELTON JOHN

Victim Of Love (Rocket)

ELTON John's disco album doesn't work. Eli attempts but fails to mate his familiar warm, rolling angles with Pate Bellote's frogmarching backbeat strictness.

He doesn't seem to have been comfortable with a chorus since his split with Bernie Taupin; these days they're all so urgent and clipped that they rarely amount to much more than a football chant tacked onto heated attempts to breathe life into directionless verses. Maybe his confidence is a little edgy. Maybe he feels that the ballad days are over. Whatever, in wishing to remain Elton John in a world of Billy Joels he's losing sight of what he excels at.

This LP never recovers from the ten minute plus 'Johnny B Goode' that opens it. Delivered deadpan and rocky, 'JBG' soon sinks below the waves. Elsewhere overall polish and Bellote's excellent drum sound can't paint over the cracks in empty melodies; flaws which are emphasised all the more when you remember that this is Elton John's voice and as such should be paced and warm not 'boogying' through anagrams of 'The Bitch Is Back' like so many Dan Hartmans.

I suppose that Bellote's backdrop passes on its own, ditto John's personality and passion, but together they wind on increasingly desperately. Hey, Reg, relax. You don't need to sound like the guest on your own albums.

CITY BOY

The Day The Earth Caught Fire (Phonogram)

HOLY Tornado, City Boy reckon it's Armageddon! Stop the world, they wanna get off. It's all so logical mind you.

Remember — this troupe were writing concept albums when everyone else was sniffin' glue, flaunting technique when no-one else could even tune up, and warbling their when the rest of the populace couldn't give two monkeys for anything but the sonic boom.

Yes, it's logical that City Boy have just spent God knows how much time and money sunning it in Nassau — along with the king of 'Big Sound', 'Mutt' Lange — to issue forth the fifth in a series of timeless, dissipated records.

Over-produced to swell its sumptuous contents, the result is a humourless and bombastic ode to the dawning of The Apolalypse, shaken not stirred for the air channels of the visionless affluent. I don't mind admitting that I like some of their ideas. I like the way they expand their songs into objective dramas split between different characters; I like some of their arrangements — especially the outmoded 'Eleanor Rigby' strings; and here I like the way they punctuate the words with banner headlines, just like those tabloids that come spinning out of the frames of silent films.

But as an album, it's doomed. The 'Concept' — it opens and closes with the pips of the speaking clock — would have us believe that their love affairs are the pits, that ambition tends towards suicide, and that it's too late to start packing as Planet Earth is but seconds from self-destruction. I'd blame it on the Conservatives myself.

IMPORTS

RUPERT Holmes doesn't merely write songs, he creates whole movie plots. Then, after setting them to music, he condenses each epic into a three or four minute spot on a record album. I first latched on to his way of things back in '74, when he emerged with 'Widescreen', a mini-night at the NFT that included such creations as 'Soap Opera', 'Phantom Of The Opera' and the marvellous 'Second Saxophone'. 'Rupert Holmes', which followed some months later, included 'Brass Knuckles' a superb paean to Philip Marlowe and similar gumshoes, and confirmed Holmes' position as the Scorsese of sound.

However, neither record climbed dramatically on the sales graph, so Holmes, pausing briefly to produce an album with Babs Streisand, headed off in what he considered to be a more profitable direction, cutting 'Singles' and 'Pursuit Of Happiness', both ultimately forgettable offerings. Happily 'Partners In Crime' (Infinity) the super-cool Holmes' latest release, is a return to former glories, a blockbuster that deserves to have the queue for the stalls forming immediately.

The title track, which is freeze-framed over a riff borrowed from James Brown, looks at various love-hate relationships through Holmes' camera lens, while 'Lunch Hour', which deals with the 60 minute sex and a sandwich syndrome, also gets the cinematic treatment. Holmes revealing that 'He takes a drive everyday, from Brooklyn to JFK/Because he meets a flight from Montreal/And every day he'll wait outside Air Canada's gate/Cause she's a stewardess who's connecting with St Paul' as he sets up yet another storyline.

'Him', probably the most single-minded cut on the album, harks back to the subject of infidelity: 'Answering Machine' relates to the problems of romance in this automated world: 'Near-sighted' is pure Woody Allen and lists the benefits of having less than 20/20 vision — 'I don't judge a friend or lover by the first or second look/Nor a book by the cover — hell, I can't even see the book!'... but why should I spoil the end of the picture for you? Go see it for yourself on your own pair of cans. And don't forget to grab the orange-drink and popcorn as you turn the record over.

THE CARPETTES Frustration Paradise (Beggars Banquet)

THERE can't be many more competitive markets than the one for saw-toothed three-piece pop/rock outfits. Especially those angling for a hit single in the Lowe/Yachts/Jam waters. The disastrously named Carpettes (all male) — the latest signing to the fast-reviving Beggars Banquet — aren't making life over-easy for themselves, but as this courageous debut readily attests, they're certainly strong contenders.

It's based around the kind of uninspiring teenage emotional dilemmas heralded by its title — which suggests that, as their only hope of being salvaged from a life-sentence of dull support gigs is by charting into TOTP-land, the search for the lost hook must take priority. The production's a treat, bringing a vivid, ringing tone to a very standardised frame, keeping the instruments separate and well-defined, and offloading a little authority onto a string of songs that still don't pack much of a punch on stage.

Guitarist Neil Thompson takes most of the songwriting credit, leaning heavy on his pure pop sensibility and getting just about every available variation on four major chords. He's got a studied grasp of all the 'right' commercial ingredients, which compensates for his lifeless vocals — as do his welcome and unusually lengthy guitar solos. Apart from a truly gruesome shot at the compulsory white reggae number, 'ABC', his songs are strong, sharp and surprisingly individual.

George Maddison (bass) and drummer Tim Wilder contribute the album's two standouts: 'Johnny Won't Hurt You', which unless I'm much mistaken is a cautionary offering to Rotten, and 'Indo-China', whose machine-gun percussion and frantic Burnel bassline manage to divert from its ropery political content. I'm not saying the band's progressive, original, or even worthy of much attention, but they might just strike a seam of 45s. On their own ground, you could say, The Carpettes take a lot of beating.

Mark Ellen

THE A's The A's (Arista)

THIS is one of those frantic and obscurely aggressive pop records; it chases around after its own tail. It's full of instant sound and fury and it signifies nothing. The A's spit through clenched teeth, but only over what they hope are cute dance tunes. I can't see any point in the A's at all.

Five boys from Philadelphia, in five black leather jackets, the A's might be what now passes for 'New Wave', especially in America, just as even the horrendous Knack are supposed to be. But I can't see anything terribly radical or challenging in what sounds like the Boomtown Fats playing the drearier non-hits of The New York Dolls.

They trade in quick bursts of bitterness, anguish or satire that leave you none the wiser and wondering if their hearts are really in it anyway. It's all fast and lively stuff, I suppose, but any edge the music's has owes more to desperate ambition than to genuine excitement.

What's worse, the hooks don't even hook.

STANLEY CLARKE I Wanna Play For You (Epic)

STANLEY Clarke displays his technique and his eclecticism to little good effect writing a double album of live and studio tracks, new songs and old hits, ranging across jazz-rock, funk, pop and simple flash. A few tracks approach the pleasant but even the host of guest appearances — Jeff Beck, George Duke, Stan Getz, Freddie Hubbard, Lee Ritenour — fails to lend weight to the project.

Clarke's bass dominates to an extent that makes the instrument's limitations painfully obvious. Even the jazz tracks, more amenable to a heavy bass presence, are disappointing because Clarke's slickness far surpasses his emotional depth. His 'Blues For Mingus' is distressingly trivial.

Clarke may have been a good New Barbarian but here he's just another old crossover hack.

LENNY WILLIAMS Love Current (MCA)

THEY'RE all doing it — from Oldfield to Maccs to Mayall, so there's no earthly reason why Lenny Williams shouldn't go disco too.

In fact disco is no great departure from the crisp funk/rock stomping-grounds of Williams' former troupe, the Oakland-based Tower of Power. With 'Love Current' Lenny's trying to convey the importance of the emotional ripples that disrupt one's life as a well-kyled West Coast session crooner. The back cover seems to bear this testimony — Len, underwater, frozen in mock surprise as a female hand makes his clothing feel more comfortable.

When it ain't disco, it's sharp, sensitized, satisfying funk — sizzling hi-hats, thumb-thwackin' bass, tricky little congas slaps and brazen horns. On occasions, there's such a surfeit of syndrums yo'ying round the mix it's like a soundtrack for a jungle documentary. But, when it ain't funk, there's a fair smattering of soul-tinged, smouldering balladry that gives the album the same kind of variety as the average Gladys Knight sampler.

If you like shaking your bad self, 'Love Current' should help kick-start the legs.

SCREAMS Screams (Infinity)

I fear we are soon to be inundated with hype about American 'new wave' pop groups. The Knack (yuk) we've already suffered, The Pop (ugh) are coming and Screams (laugh) are here.

Screams derive from Bowie/Ronson via The Cars. They come nowhere near the intelligence or attractiveness of either (such as they are). They thrash around hopefully but with little indication of imagination or even tunefulness. Structure seems beyond them. Originality goes begging.

A few typical, er, rock'n'roll stompers, a few pretentious ballads, a lot of 'energetic' guitar. But really it's all padding, done out in early '70s decor. A sorry, desperate attempt at fun.

I mean, why give time to dreadful American pop groups when there are already so many in England?

SUPERTRAMP are back home again from their exile in the States, but it's only a temporary visit, and they're not even playing any provincial dates. If you want to see them in action, you'll have the travel to the Wembley Arena in North London, where they're opening a series of concerts on Tuesday.

Still more gigs: nearly 700 this week

● AC/DC are back in Britain for the first part of a two-leg tour, the second half being in December. They kick off at Newcastle on Thursday and Friday, followed by Glasgow (Saturday and Sunday) and Manchester (Monday and Tuesday). Support acts are Def Leppard.
 ● GALLAGHER & LYLE go on the road, for what has become their traditional annual tour, and this time they have the added attraction of chart star Judie Tzuke as guest star. First dates are Bridlington (Saturday), Hanley (Sunday), Coventry (Monday), Birmingham (Tuesday) and Leicester (Wednesday).
 ● THE MOODY BLUES are playing their long-awaited British reunion dates, about 18 months after their re-formation. Their opening concerts are at Glasgow (Monday) and Stafford (Wednesday).

 ● Other new tours opening this week include CARAVAN who begin their first UK outing for 18 months at York (Monday), Durham (Tuesday) and Southampton (Wednesday), and the highly-rated GANG OF FOUR, whose initial gigs are at Birmingham (Tuesday) and Bradford (Wednesday).
 A reminder that dates for inclusion in these pages should be sent (post only) to NME Gig Guide, 5-7 Carnaby Street, London W1V 1PG, to arrive at least a week prior to publication.

REEFER MADNESS

By Larry Sloman
(Bobbs-Merrill)

THE sub-title of Reefer Madness is The History of Marijuana in America, a suitably portentous and vague definition for Mr Sloman's unnecessarily laboured and inconclusive study on the usage and attitudes of a nation working at play.

Sloman concentrates his findings over 400 pages of detailed analysis that intend to uncover the method and the madness behind the infamous Harry Anslinger and his brainchild, the Narcotics Bureau. To this end the author traces a smoky pattern across the minefields of civil service legislation and the social effects of the devil weed from the jazz age to the present day.

If he'd shut up shop there we might be slightly the wiser about a subject which has its grass roots in natural growth and enough trustworthy devotees to prove conclusively that any law which threatens to turn harmless hedonists into criminals is an ass.

But Larry doesn't stop there. He has a book to write and a reputation to maintain (he has already published On The Road With Bob Dylan: Rolling With The Thunder and penned songs for Derringer). So, after some rather dry but interesting enlightenment comes the subjective present. Interviews with middle class users printed verbatim in dull extremis. Dishing the entire ship Sloman concentrates on finding a cross-section of the maddest, least lucid advocates of a popular pleasure since the Watney's Red Barrel advertising campaign and that means the stoned dictators of NORML, a few Yippy left-overs and the odd dealer — all of them suitable cases for treatment.

We've retired to a life of ease

TWO HOURS TO DOOM

Dribbling through dopey America

The major pitfalls in Sloman's progress is his style. This deviates between a clumsy past historic and an infuriating use of the third person for author at arbitrary moments.

Perhaps the man fancies himself as some keeper of the beatnik flame (the title of his Dylan tome would suggest this) — or worse, a leading light in the para-journalist school where the writer becomes judge, jury and hanging party at an inquest of only academic interest to the great majority. Even nice, safe Allen Ginsberg is trotted in and out to spout the occasional pearl of wisdom whenever the credibility count is curving low.

Too bad that there wasn't some savant at hand to wield the fulcrum of restraint because sections of Reefer Madness would constitute a readable and energetic magazine article. The chapter entitled The Jazz Musician's Pogrom speaks volumes on the subject and indicates that Sloman (sic) could make a conscientious and worthwhile collection of the early dope ballads of Fats Waller, Cab Calloway, etc.

No doubt this book was fun to prepare and entailed a lot of work but the overall value of its findings is negligible, a pipe dream going up in smoke. For a selection of far more interesting and practical papers on the subject consult your local tobacconist.

THE BUDDY HOLLY STORY
By John Tobler

(Plexus £2.50).

I KNOW it's blasphemous to say so, but I'm bored with Buddy Holly, even if he was a genius and wrote more songs people remember than even The Beatles.

You know the titles: 'Peggy Sue', 'Heartbeat', 'It Doesn't Matter Anymore', 'That'll Be The Day', etc. And you probably know the words, too.

That's the trouble with Buddy Holly; his work has become too familiar, too engrained. There's no surprise left. It was inevitable, of course, so many people have recorded his stuff: the Stones, The Beatles, Linda Ronstadt, Blondie and so on. Great songs, sometimes sung well, but certainly too often. So who needs a book about Buddy, when his music speaks for itself?

John Tobler's format for this thin volume seems wrong. Big pages are right for a picture book, but who wants endless black and white pictures, especially of a man not given to varied expressions? Worse, who needs pages of pictures devoted to the movie version of Buddy's life, just so Tobler can cash in on its so-so success?

Admittedly, most of the book is devoted to the real Buddy, and Tobler appears to have done some impressive research. For example, he dug out a reference to Holly in an ancient school list. Clever of him to have found it, but do we care now that he has?

The book has its intriguing moments. In 1955, Buddy played in Elvis Presley's backing group when Elvis visited Holly's home town of Lubbock, Texas. Pity the bootleggers missed that one.

Details of this kind make for a readable book, but at the end of it I still feel that I don't know too much about its subject.

The question remains: what kind of man has that kind of a musical gift? His music apart, Buddy seems to have been boringly ordinary. But then, there's little point in considering him apart from his music. If you don't feel as jaded towards it as I've become, you might try the double 'Legend' album on MCA Coral. That's probably a more worthwhile investment.

1979. It's getting very late, very suddenly. Our decayed decade crawls exhausted to its end, and not before time for who knows what tomorrow may bring? Aren't we on the brink now, isn't this where The Old gives up its ghost and lets The New get born?

In a word, No, actually.

What happens next, in several ways, is just what happened last. Too many people have a stake in the past — a financial commitment, an emotional investment — to let the future take its course altogether. Too many people make a living out of Yesterday — or plan to — to let Tomorrow interfere.

Whether that's bad depends how far these same people are going to restrict the openings, in terms of market demand and command of an industry's dwindling resources, for the untied innovators queuing up outside.

But for as long as the majority of us are reassured by the familiar, rather than bored with it, then you can be sure that the past will always be re-packaged and offered to us as the easier option — easier financially (because artistic risks are marketing risks) and easier creatively (artists might run out of ideas, but they've still got careers to consider).

Given the right recipe, tastes stay constant, but affections are more fickle, especially where the performer's appeal outweighs the music's strength — the usual teenybop syndrome — and attention spans can be short.

Drop from sight, however temporarily, and the climb-back might be hellish.

My mission: to hunt down Yesterday's Men, to boldly go and be bored as no critic has ever been bored before, to bring back the heads of men who've looked Extinction in the face but wouldn't take the hint.

I wanted a cross-section of the kind of acts that saw us into and through the '70s (pre-punk, anyway) but who looked like inviting themselves into the '80s as well. The people who just didn't know when to call it a day.

Well that was the plan, that was the quest: to root out the redundants and the come-back merchants, maybe annihilate the notion that any one of them has a single thing to say to 1980. But where to begin this epic descent to the very depths of tedium, where best to find terminal uselessness at its worst and dearest?

I figured it had to be Croydon on a Sunday night.

Not a bad guess in fact, because it was here I discovered those "cheeky" Georgies, Lindisfarne — reunited and peddling their history with all the graceless desperation of one-legged unicyclists.

That Lindisfarne's drab and ersatz folk confection has long passed into irrelevance, so far as contemporary music is concerned, must be reasonably apparent to all involved. The defence, presumably, is that it's unique and distinctive and lingers in the affections of too many people to be allowed to die, and, of course, that they love what they're doing. Perhaps.

Or is it because there's really nothing else to do, solo careers having failed, except get back together and do it all again? To look for your old crowd, grown older and relaxed and neatly-dressed, out in suburban civic-centres and play the dog-eared nostalgia card for all it's worth?

Granted, I don't like their music with its soggy harmonies and limp acoustic centre, nor can I take their songs: the jolly ones sound forced and the serious ones spurious. But that aside, tonight's remorseless plug-the-union campaign (with full merchandising back-up operation) came across as particularly mercenary.

The Lindisfarne machine has wound down to its last two functions. One is as a contraption for attracting cash: how efficiently it still carries this out I don't know, but it certainly feels the need to employ persuasion to drum up custom, more than it did in younger days.

The other function was explained to me by someone from Camel, after their set at Brighton.

"Whatever you say about this business, for every musician and every manager and every journalist in it, well at least that's a can has person down the bloody pit-shaft, isn't it?"

Camel have been going long enough to qualify for the inscribed watch-and-chain too, it seems, although their regular turnover of personnel suggests some element of self-regeneration. There's something thoughtful, but un-pressured, about their music; commercially speaking, they might be ploughing a rather lonely furrow, but they give the impression of being almost too engrossed to notice.

You'd hardly call it 'progressive' any more (for all its complexity and sophistication), and it's too pleasant to be called demanding or difficult. They give 'concerts' rather than 'play gigs', and seem to appeal to orderly audiences that take their relaxation seriously. They are, in their own strange way, an uncompromising band.

Camel are free from cheap-shot pomposity and haven't resorted to indulgence and flash to any great degree. If they were crasser they might be bigger, but they're not, so they're not.

Camel's strand of '70s music stresses accomplishment; it doesn't lack feeling, at least to a lot of people, but it identifies progress with technical development. It's a meticulous business, hardly linked to the more turbulent currents of Rock's mainstream at all, even when it makes attempts in that direction.

Camel could probably wander quietly on for ever.

All I can say is I like it well enough when it's stuck in front of me. It's fine but I wouldn't seek it out; it's not close enough to the sort of music I love for me to hate it.

And that's where Heavy Metal comes in.

Like Camel, Whitesnake value their proficiency, but take far more care to see it's used to crowd-pleasing effect. Whitesnake are highly competent, and regard this as important. They're aggrieved that critics seem to ignore this aspect and concentrate on 'trivial' things. They point this out to me as courteously as their low opinion of NME will allow.

I've got the romantic notion about rock'n'roll: that a performer's best music nearly always gets made in that first, frantic burst. That people walk away, if not straight away, with experience. Doesn't always help: that conventional idea of improvement-over-time just doesn't apply.

But you can't expect that kind of talk to cut much ice with the experienced, technically-advanced musician. To agree would be to undermine the source of his professional pride, to question his right to stay in the game.

Besides, however I feel about their music, Whitesnake say, with complete justification, that they satisfy a real demand.

The Birmingham (deon) beers them out a few thousand times over, in the shape of those ecstatic kids — who simply can't be dismissed as either evil or stupid, because they're not — whose loyalties stand firm with little outside inducement.

You can't explain away Whitesnake's success with mere reference to manipulation. If NME (or 'heavy metal' as Whitesnake prefer) sounds stagnant and lead to me and others, then it's the conservatism of NME which accounts for its persistence, not the determination of bands to foist it upon them.

Whitesnake, and the other Deep Purple offshoot outfit Gillan, show absolute grasp of their audience's demands. I don't believe that either have whipsawed that crowd out of nothing, and have got to concede they can satisfy it impressively.

The successful act has a professional stake in continuity, just as journalists have a vested interest in turmoil and change. I could go on to detail all my dislike of Heavy Metal, but it's a battle I'm less and less inclined to slog away at. There must be more important things to worry about.

Like, is there life after America?

The London appearances from Slade, at the City University last week, and Steve Harley with Cockney Rebel this weekend, were a chance to re-assess two giants of the mid-decade returned to this country a little shrunkenly, but still spoiling for a second bite at that big cherry. One is an immensely likeable outfit, and the other... well, we'll come to Steve in a moment.

Slade were the same unredeemable and utterly vulgar fun they always were. Very little seems to have changed, from Noddy Holder's unlovely rasp to the clomping, bulby-boy thrash of the group's old repertoire.

"From here on," yelled Noddy, bug-eyed and laughing, "it's ROCK AND ROLL all the way!"

And of course it was.

The only doubt now must be whether Slade can ever regain their lost constituency, the teenybop power-base that grows up and evaporates, or ever rebuild a new one. We're not the same as when they began, even if they are.

And the next contestant, please...

However vast his need, Steve Harley has no God-given rights to stardom.

It's possible he's never understood this. Even as one of his first fans I wondered if he had talents massive enough to match and back up his ambition, wobbling on a slack tightrope held at either end by Bowie and Bolan.

But it was easy to love the 'contender' image he manufactured: always the pushy outsider, victim of a mythical closed-shop; but never quite the achiever.

And that was how he made a triumph out of his come-back last Saturday.

On a musical level, the gig was entirely unexceptional. But as living theatre, as a corny almost-real-life melodrama, it was magnificent. It could have been an old Hollywood bio-pic; it could have been The Johnson Story — an event that contrived, that perfected.

So to begin, through 'Roll The Dice' and 'Mr. Soft', he was tense and awkward — genuinely, but ostentatiously as well — and finally overcame it, lump-in-throat but bravado winning through.

"I've been a bit shaky (applause). It's nice to see ya (waves of applause). I got many other lines of bullshit, you know you can't believe a word I say." (Laughter and more applause.)

What else? A monologue and song about poor Dino ("I just wanna be someone, anyone / But I wanna be a star for a week or two"), obviously relishing the intended autobiographical resonance. A bit flinty over-the-top "Soberation", a reunion duet with Ron Craggs for 'The Best Years Of Our Lives', a massed Motormen-style chorus of 'Oh Dear, Look At That They've Grown To The Blues'.

And so far as it goes, the party is: it is that many rambling memories. It celebrates all our yesterdays, and tells us Harley can make some more mileage out of 'Make Me Smile' (Perhaps he'll be content with that, I don't know).

I know that I won't be content with it. Not in 1979. It's too late.

All Our Yesterdays Men

Paul Du Noyer set out to explore dog-eared nostalgia and discovered that Harley, Slade, Gillan, Whitesnake, Camel and Lindisfarne looked extinction in the face, but wouldn't take the hint.

Gillan, Holder and Coverdale repackage their past. (ix Tony Macaulay, Robert Ellis, Fin Costello)

The Motels

Marquee

Los Angeles, once a bastion of great rock music with names like The Byrds, Beach Boys, Buffalo Springfield, Doors, Love and a cast of thousands, fell into a torpor as the '70s got underway. Steely Dan were the only group of any consequence to emerge before the New Wave mushroom clouded up, but since then LA has seemed incapable of producing anything of merit in terms of new bands.

Which is hardly surprising considering that a shiny old charlatan like Kim Fowley got his gnarled, vampiric fingers into every band that sprang up under the new wave banner.

As far as I know, LA's Motels have never had anything to do with Fowley: which is one thing in their favour. The other is that they are a good group, led by a fine vocalist and songwriter in Martha Davis, replete with a strong, musically 'sound' ensemble who back her up with just the right sense of dynamics and all-purpose texturing.

The Motels' talents, ably showcased on their debut Capitol album, are made extra manifest when encountered in the flesh, even if that's in the sweaty, slobbish confines of the Marquee club on a Friday night where a bevy of punks and punkettes go through their ritual Sid Vicious impersonations and the usual music biz parasites stand just behind you talking too loud. Still, The Motels intently work on a slick but effective set of Ms Davis' numbers.

The band — visually anonymous except for guitarist Jeff Jourard who looks like Willy De Ville and makes the most of the resemblance — are all pros. Drummer Brian Glascock (who played on Iggy's 'Kill City' sessions) and bassist Michael Goodroe make for a sturdy rhythm section. Apart from Jourard who plays tough splintered shards of riffs, the main instrument whizz is the latter's brother Martin whose polymorphous embellishments and saxophone solos are always deadily effective.

Although Martha's dress-sense and general onstage demeanour make her appear somewhat tart, she's blessed with a strong voice, and the restless frustration in her movements perfectly complements her songs. For such an obviously hot band, the high points of the set surprisingly occurred when they were at their most restrained. Davis became a torch singer for 'Porn Reggae' (a strong performance even though the song is far too influenced by 'Watching The Detectives') and her best song 'Closets & Bullets', punctuated by Martin J.'s superb sax solo.

Otherwise it was a strong, invigorating set of classy rock — well performed, precise, bristling with ingenuity.

Already the word is out on the band, even though one report claimed them to be the best US band to hit the UK since Talking Heads: a patently ridiculous statement. Don't be misled but then again, don't be put off. Go and see The Motels and invent your own comparisons.

The Contortions

New York

James Chance knows only too well that there's no success like failure.

The boy has doom written all over him: the possessed look of a man who's pissed off because he sold his soul to the devil to play the saxophone. Show biz dabblers like The Cramps may make suggestions about voodoo rock, but Chance really beats those dark drums.

He's scary and twisted and not all of his public persona is an act.

He bills himself as James White now. Forget it, he's likely to change his mind next week. He'll probably also be hiring and firing musicians till kingdom come, but for now, the glorious, supremely anarchic, nail-you-to-the-wall days of the old Contortions are gone.

Chance brought his new Contortions into Max's for a weekend stand, and they are a much different group — a disciplined and formalised hybrid of funk, jazz and disco rhythms: a carefully calculated groove that has replaced the old tension and madness.

There is another factor to the change: the old Contortions were free spirits, as crazed and indomitable as Chance, and each performance was a battle of asseriveness. They attacked with grating urgency, instruments rubbing up against each other the wrong way. In that setting, Chance's inspired honking and shouting was just another element in the general cacophony.

This was not to Chance's liking. His need is to be the single star, the unchallenged centre of attention on the stage.

A dotty aunt's

Lene Lovich
Jane Aire And The Belvederes
The Meteors

Loughborough

I hope Holland has more than The Meteors whose music has been around for some time now and sounds tired. They are pretty unmemorable apart from the lead singer who poses incongruously on top of an all-too-familiar format.

Jane Aire has a smooth, strong voice wrapped in a thick, glossy sound. A small token specimen of zany femininity who gambols in front of an identically dressed all male group, she sings songs that effectively dispel any odour of emotion. What remains is flaccid, amusing and defused, and it's a shame because the occasional broken stutter or shout show that she's selling herself short with this stuff.

The next woman to take the stage is part fairground barker heckoning on the edge of a sleazy, deranged electric existence. When her platts flap and her eyes pop and snap she's a bizarre, good-natured, vampiric visitation. She is also that dotty, delightful aunt whose benign eccentricities shatter the social code; and when she clasps that overlaid head in her hands she's a gleeful Cassandra pronouncing prophecies of a thrilling fate.

Lene Lovich moves in deliberate, sonorous curves executed as carefully as the sequences and steps of a primitive vogue dance. She is red-tipped and white-faced; she speaks with a warm, warped accent and when she smiles she seems almost shy.

She has the usual outrageous confection attached to her head and is draped in strips and rags of yellow and black.

But the frippery doesn't detract from the fact that she's finished flirting round the edges of rock. Her clever, catchy,

The new Contortions facelessly support his antics without detracting from him. One can't fault them for doing only what they were hired to — which is to lay down a tight rhythmic groove and stick with it, while Chance alone takes the walk out to the edge.

One misses the old excitement, the sensation of a musical battle zone. But these Contortions are a more pleasant, if less stirring, experience.

The concept of rock rhythms infused with jazz and funk has given way to pure funk. The six-piece churns out a danceable, slightly cracked crossover of George Clinton funk and disco rhythms. They produce their sound with robot-like determination, and the pace and tonal texture vary little from song to song.

The droning slide guitar —

cut-up pop has been superseded by a sound that is strong, powerful and superb.

The new numbers are fuller and more finished than anything she's previously achieved. 'Wonderful One' has a lascivious thump and high, splitting shrieks; 'You Can't Kill Me' is slow and stabbing with bare blows of sound; 'Joan' (of Arc, of course) is crusading and triumphant, and during 'The Angels' Lene's voice achieves the dreamy distance of an unearthly choir.

Trills, tweets and whistles pierce the dense, eerie atmospherics of 'Bird Song' and she dedicates 'What Would I Do Without You' to the audience, one spiky finger shredding the air above the heads of the crowd.

Old numbers are given deep treatment. 'The Writing On The Wall' has chill winds and a skilful stream of sax. 'Too Tender To Touch' takes its time, a spotlight selecting first Les Chappell (who's joined Dean Klavett on keyboards), then Justin Hildreth (drums) and Mark Chaplin (bass) and lastly Lene herself as the song builds, blossoms and spreads.

The new band is already an entity in itself. Shown off in a simple effective stage setting, they create a forceful, cohesive sound, Lene playing more sax which tears strips off the surface or loses itself and gets soft and sensitive. Her voice see-saws and plummets, whimpers and soars and apart from the pyrotechnics, it's used straight and soulful in 'The Night' and quivers with suppressed emotion during a 'Home'.

They encore with a stripped-down almost ska'd 'Lucky Number' which has three front-people high-kicking it across the stage. But it's a personal triumph that despite the distractions of dress and demeanour, Lene Lovich seems sincere and generous and always herself.

She is breaking down barriers, avoiding the pitfalls and she's well on the way to winning.

Lynn Hanna

which in Pat Place's hands had been an abrasive weapon — is now played by Kristien Hoffman (of The Mumps) in a much more subdued manner. New keyboardist Steve Kramer is supportive, but he lacks Adele Bertel's inventive wildness. The rhythm section clearly dominates here, kicking things along with clockwork precision. Were it not for Chance's presence, this could almost be a cocktail lounge band.

Against this backdrop Chance flings his body, saxophone and voice, cutting across the geometric regularity with crazed, bold strokes. Chance's stage-craft aims for something like a cross between James Brown and Iggy Pop, and although he doesn't hit the mark, it's exciting to watch him try.

His stock trick is to clamber into the audience and threaten people. At Max's he crawled over table tops on all fours, once bringing his sax with him, once simply continuing his verbal free-form barrage of shouts, whines and exhortations. At one point he collapsed, writhing on a table-top, and conga player Bradley Field leapt up and dragged him back to the stage.

The obviousness of this James Brown rip-off would have been merely campy humour if it were not that Chance is just a bit crazed, and the danger of a really violent confrontation bubbles underneath the proceedings like a smouldering volcano.

The intensity of Chance's performance was the only factor to distinguish one song from another. One cover, Chic's 'Good Times', transformed the disco celebration song into a confession of the sins of the Western world. 'Contort Yourself' was suitably manic, with Chance raving, threatening and blowing his sax like he was trying to wake the dead.

His playing sparks the band; Chance wants it to sound unschooled and undisciplined, but his developing technique belies the conceit. He's learning to weave together just the right strands of order and chaos.

Ultimately Chance's egomania works against him. By refusing to allow anyone else on stage to do anything as adventurous or dynamic as him, he misses out. But Chance is too mercurial a figure to let us believe he won't change his mind again.

He's unsettled and unsettling, and that's all that is taken for granted.

Two tone: a tonic for the troops

The Specials Madness The Selecter

Bournemouth

Sharp shirt, black 'n' white trowsers, pinned-down collar and tie: The Ska Machine snow-balls into Bournemouth.

Home hint: If you want to revive something, root for the obscure and the chances are that to most people it'll sound Brand New. Home hint (2): a custom-made fan is a definite plus, preferably one capable of taking gargantuan leaps through space and time and arriving intact, in a different context, with scarce a hair out of place.

Thus has the mid-'60s Jamaican 'super-hooligan', The Rudy, spawned the seething, soaking, asphyxiating army of natty dressers who are at present sardined into the suppurating bowels of this converted bowling alley.

Tell me it all makes sense. Thus too have the two-tones brought a tonic to the troops, the near-total wave of adulation left in their wake mainly resulting from their advantageous lack of a comparable yardstick. Flashbacks to their peer-groups are pointless; even if you remember the originals, they've mostly been re-vamped beyond recognition.

So the only way of gauging the respective worth of these bands is within the Ska Machine's own perspective, by opening up this self-contained, self-regulating land perhaps imminently self-destructive package, and laying out its contents side by side.

Between them, the three bands stretch to both ends of the ska spectrum. The Specials keep dead centre, sea-sawing around a strict, brassy bluebeat, with The Selecter veering off to a reggae fringe and Madness keeping their wheels grinding against the curb of basic R&B.

The Selecter and Madness make an effective contrast. Within the ska context their two sounds are poles apart. The Selecter creating a rigid centre rhythm with its edges frenzied, frayed and coloured by a wavering ice-rink organ and 'big sound' twangy guitar, and Madness keeping their centre loose, fluid and flexible and their edges filed down with cheese-grater chords, sturdy Farfisa and reckless, raucous sax.

Madness have the edge, they also have the mobility. At some point in their set, it dawns on me that if this isn't Heaven, it has to be the place next door.

Square-jawed Sugge and his attendant skanker Chas Smash reckon much the same thing and treat us to some flailing choreography — a stop / start idiot routine for 'The Prince', and one of those three-in-a-line cake-walk numbers with the saxist in 'Madness'.

The Selecter (who open) are less adventurous but still a fearsome dance force. Their sound's so bass-heavy that when the dreadlocked Charlie busts a string mid-number, the mix all but disintegrates without him.

They deliver steam locomotive bluebeat jangling with angular chords, rattling with percussion and fronted by Gabs and the frenetic, wide-eyed Pauline who belt around like a couple of yo-yos wired to the mains.

Two numbers punch you right between the eyes, the single 'On Your Radio', with a disarming echo vocal from Pauline, and their suitably sinister reading of The James Bond Theme'.

For the rest, The Selecter merely keep your feet warm. Same goes for The Specials who, compared with the last three times I've sampled their wares, come suspiciously close to going through the motions.

I watch them from stage left, wedged between bassist Sir Horace Gentlemen and a dozen girls with bouffants who hear the opening chords to 'Dawning Of A New Era' and go completely mental. The band fall into line, steaming up and down like a rack of well-oiled trumpet valves with the garishly gap-toothed Jerry Dammers leaping so high off his keyboard deck that it takes two roadies to stop his stack collapsing.

After the colours of the Madness set, 'It's Up To You', 'Concrete Jungle' and 'Doesn't Make It Alright' sound flat, drained and lifeless — as does vocalist Terry Hall, normally unpredictable but tonight obviously saving his strength for the remaining 38 dates.

Salvation is short and sweet in the form of the exuberant Rico (trombone) and the excellent Dick Cuthall (trumpet) adding a missing warmth and fullness and rounding off scarred edges into a rich, embracing wall of sound.

Something The Specials usually achieve unassisted. I'm left unmoved, maybe because — unlike Madness — their ever-tighter sense of discipline seems to be clouding their will to expand.

That tends to be the case with Skaville: a great place to visit but I wouldn't want to live there.

Lou Reed

Hammersmith Odeon

Within the context of rock 'n' roll's 'social effect', particular ideological tendencies are presumably far less important than the names, drug habits and sexual preferences of the stars. Vulgar notions such as 'individual genius' and 'legendary status' are more appropriate than criticism which might at least designate the social context of music-making production.

The illusory importance and autonomy of private rock 'n' roll life drags on only as an appendage of the social processes that surround it.

I mean like you know that crazy Lou's a yo-yo, you know man? You can't tie that cat down one minute he's pure goddamn genius, like, rock and roll Dostoyevsky then the next he is so soon hopeless man! I mean — only a TRUE ARTIST could be like that you know?

Our little lord precious Lou Reed, likes to play on being Lou Reed, the implication always having been that, you know, Lou Reed is creative, a privileged Artist, all this New York Warhol — the 'personal' is artistic 'per se' — Art/Muscle crossover jerking: forever transitively.

All this nonsense about Lou Reed being one of the 'greatest writers' the world might ever know... well, don't walk on the high-cultural wild side... what a pitifully, stupidly naive way of looking at things.

Any song, any text, is not simply one line of words releasing a single meaning (the 'message' of the Author), but a multi-dimensional space in which a variety of writings, none of them original, blend and clash: a tissue of quotations drawn from innumerable centres of culture. The Velvet Underground work, for instance, mixed and blurred strains of black humour, tragedy, epic narrative, the unconscious, frameworks of need and desire. Now, Lou.

I mean, like all he has to do is throw together a listful of rock and roll clichés, you know, 'streets' and 'boogies' and 'hessies' and so forth and all the right chemical references (sniff sniff) and he has normally quite rational people grovelling at his boots/straps! Wow!

Of course once the Author has been found, the song's text is 'explained' — victory to the critic. Thus, every last hiss and moan of Lou Reed's recorded output can be systematically dribbled over.

His performance at the Hammersmith Odeon (the opening night of three) was probably his Crime And Punishment: who knows or cares? It's not so much that I found it unappealing as a lit' ol' consumer in the stalls, or that it failed to live up to my/any expectations of Lou Reed as Lou Reed.

No, simply as a night out in the rock and roll space it was undeniably lacklustre, clichéd, antiquated, unadventurous and pretty insulting.

He ruled out the multiplicity of rock 'n' roll performance and sketched in a tired and tiresome caricature, a bar-room bore figure whose every gesture and intonation fell upon stony ground, floored arrogance and bathos.

But man this is the guy who wrote 'HEROIN'! 'SWEET JANE'! All that stuff on 'BERLIN'! 'SAD SONG'! man! Or even 'PERFECT DAY'! 'VICIOUS'! 'WALK ON THE WILD SIDE'!

Yes, well, at the Hammersmith Odeon he had the pure dynamite artistic vision to play them all as hack Heavy Metal Cliches with all the trappings: big climactic build ups, grins amongst the lads in the band, lots of boring solos, Irish jokes, cabaret posing. The lot.

It wasn't wasted time, will-he-die-or-won't-he time. It was every muscle tight, man, a supercooper lightshow, something like the Allman Brothers-vs-The Only Ones as a backing band (can this really be the Happy House who backed Don Cherry recently?) and just the occasional scratch at his forearm to let us know that, well...

YOU ARE AFTER ALL A MYTH A REAL BONA FIDE MYTH AN ARTIST LIKE NORMAN MAILER LOUDMOUTH MACHO SPEEDFREAK BULLSHIT MERCHANT SO WHO GIVES A GODDAMN ABOUT WHAT IT ALL MIGHT ACTUALLY SIGNIFY? COS GODDAMN MAN LOU IS LOU!

I mean, this particular surfer journalist has had enough of all these rampant notions of 'individuality' and 'creativity' — the epitome and culmination of an ideology which has attached the greatest importance to the 'person' of the individual singer/writer. The image of rock 'n' roll to be found in ordinary culture is tyrannically centred on the star, their person, habits, etc, while 'criticism' still consents for the most part in saying that, you know, oh, Bowie's work is the failure of Bowie the man, Barrett's his madness, Patti Smith's her vices.

The explanation of a work is always sought in the person who produced it, as if it were always in the end, through the more or less transparent allegory of the fiction, the voice of a single person, the artist 'confiding' in us.

Somewhere over the rock'n'roll rainbow the Lou Reed survives — in a pale world of worshipful icons, useless memories.

Lou Reed isn't dead.

THE MEXICONS. PIC DAVID CONN

Welcome to the ball . . . of confusion

The Mekons

Marques

Disciplined and slick, assured and smooth, the very essence of professionalism . . . these are just a few of the words people aren't using to describe The Mekons, never have, probably never will do. This is a good thing.

Although they're becoming more cohesive, developing as something of an efficient unit over time — which reality is inevitable — the basis of their approach remains amateurish enough to ensure that The Mekons as a stage event have lost none of their shambolic charm.

What they've gained is a rhythmic reliability which has the entire place dancing from beginning to finish, in a way that the more accomplished and calculating boogie manufacturers would doubtless envy. And all this without exhortation, or crafty manipulation. They still give off an impression of managing it all by accident.

Now I don't know how this effect is achieved, how far it grows out of their reputed group philosophy [abolishing the distinctions of power and importance that separate performers from audience, I believe], and how much it's down to the way they laugh a lot, to the way they just play at playing and leave the rest to luck. But the fact is, the Mekons' kind of good-humoured, unpretentious not-quite-competence offers as good a chance of pure enjoyment as pretty well anything else around.

"Where Were You", "Never Been In A Riot", all those lovely old tunes we know and love so well, were joined by the equally melodic new single "Work All Week" — though what any of these timeless titles signify I don't have the faintest idea, as I was unable to make out a thing they were singing about.

Somehow this doesn't matter very much. The typical Mekons gig still promises to be a ball... of confusion.

Boston tea party

DANNY — a short note to set the record straight about your so called "critique" (interpreted as: slagging or axe grinding) of Boston in concert at The Rainbow. I wish you were a writer with integrity (read: balls) so you could have told the editors of NME that they should ask a more open minded writer to see the Boston concert, or that you are submitting your "review" with out going. In any event it would have been better! With all your references to Boston scoring so many goals you made your self out to be the sore loser. It's too bad your team lost but like you said at the end of the article "I'm not sure who my team is..." Nor obviously are you past "the stage of whining", you were probably the only one at the concert on a permanent bumner. You would have definitely appreciated the good energy if you had to work for your entrance to the concert like the majority of the people enjoying themselves. (Punter you call them — a slight attempt to elevate yourself at the expense of anything else). Too much negativity for me mate. What was the matter, not enough free booze, or free posters or free records for you to write a good review — don't winge! You would have liked to be with your pet group who kisses your ass for a review, or hang out with a clique of elitists who are so elite no one else knows it. But: do the paper you work for and the readers a favor: keep your personal ho-hum crap out of the reviews — stick to facts. But you have to be qualified to state a fact Danny — you would be better off sticking to what you know: tea drinking — cause you don't have the balls to slag off a band properly if that's your goal nor the qualifications for professional journalism. By the way you probably won't have the balls to print this either.

Richard Ocean, Lighting Director, Boston World Tour, Beverly Hills, California.
Posters? — D.B.
Tea drinking? Boston is famous for its tea drinking is it not? What exactly is a permanent bumner? Why don't you climb right up to the top of your absurd rig and jump off, you glorified electrician. — MB.

To all you British rock fans: after having spent a terrible night in one of London's rock clubs I feel this question must be posed. Which is cooler, making Americans squirm, or making American dollars. The English rock scene is twisted by this dilemma. Even one of your best bands (The Clash) screams its boredom with the USA while still touring and trying to make it in that despised country. I don't blame you for being bored. Everywhere you look there's some American snapping photos, or someone drinking a coke and eating a Big Mac. All you rock rags are geared towards who's in the US charts but who cares?

If the bottom line is money then bands can make big bucks in America. And the next time you are rude to Americans who come to your rock gigs remember that the band playing is eagerly awaiting the day it goes to the States anyway. Listen to your own boy and ask yourself if peace, love and understanding really are that funny.

An American who lives here. Hmmm, let me see. The dollar isn't worth a lot these days so I'll settle for the squirm. — MB.

In reference to Paul Morley's article 'The Springsteen Syndrome' (NME 6th October) I feel sadly disappointed that an NME reporter should treat an artist of Springsteen's calibre with what seemed such scant respect, suggesting as he did that the stage act was superior to the music, with whom Mr Morley admits he is not as familiar as he might be.

All those cries of "Brooooooo" clearly show how much the patrons were anticipating and enjoying the great man's performance. Perhaps they, unlike Paul Morley don't have quite so many records 'to catch up on'.

I can only suggest that Paul buy himself a few Springsteen LPs and perhaps one day he will feel as I do that contrary to the comment in the offending article, Springsteen is 'the greatest thing in the world'. T. G. Doyle, Newry, N. Ireland. You weren't even there though. I can only suggest that you sell all your Springsteen albums and come to terms with reality. — MB.

Dear Monty, I have listened to The Buzzcocks' music whilst sitting on the lavatory, standing in the goldfish pond with a bucket on my head and even whilst deep inside the NME and I cannot fault a single note whatsoever. The new album is ultra-supersonic and Pete Shelley should be awarded an OBE. Why do you yourself not fall head over heels about such a group?

Jon, Alwoodley, Leeds 17. Don't you want your dripping led? — MB.

Just thought I'd give you my view on the article written by Glenn Gibson on Gary Numan's recent Glasgow concert.

Why do you victimise Gary Numan like this — because it's all crap anyway. Gary Numan is the most talented best looking musician to hit the public but most of you half-baked hypocrites can't see this.

Who the hell does Glenn Gibson think he is? Maybe Gary Numan doesn't put over a very good stage show but Mr Gibson didn't seem to like the concert at all. Obviously he has no eyes for talent. All I can say to Mr Gibson is 'Button your hole Gibbo' What type of music does Glenn Gibson enjoy? Mozart or Chocsky? Wow what a square!

Never mind Gary, at least I love you. Janet, No 1, Gary Numan fan. Yeah, I suppose you still believe in Father Christmas too. — MB.

Paul Rambali, morons like you who call the Undertones 'puerile adolescent punk-pop' should remember that everyone has a right to their opinion.

Confused, Haywards Heath. And in this instance Paul's opinion was bang on. Couldn't fault it at all. Sorry. — MB.

I bought 'Slow Train Coming' for £4. Does that mean I still have one-fifth of my soul left? David Holmes, Reading, Berkshire. Not as such. You've merely squandered four notes on a silly bit of plastic. JANN WENNER

Paul Du Noyer is a dirty, low down, two-bit sidewinder. Randolph Scott, Deep in the heart of Texas. Gung Ho! (The Stranger who wore a gun)

If Paul Du Noyer married Fay Fife, her name would almost be French for 'walnut-leaves'. Gary, Bourmville, Birmingham. Tres amusant. Tres tres amusant. — MB.

Could I be the first again to wish you all a very merry Christmas, and long may your terrific journalism prosper. Andy Kent, Bracknell, Berks. P.S. Hope you bought yourselves something with the £5 enclosed.

I wrote to you guys because I couldn't stand it any longer. Who in the hell do you think you are concerning Americans? You write about us as though we were mewling brats sucking up to The Bee Gees, The Knack or The Eagles caring nothing about rock-n-roll or what it stands for.

How are you to judge us Americans when we never get to hear punk rock on the radio, only sanitized new wave and when the country finally catches on it's two, three years after the initial break? We hardly get to see punk bands because they never come here and it seems the bands here seem scared to get back to the basics, the wimps.

You gotta admit though, even in England punk ain't what it used to be. Where's that raw primitive energy, the refusal to compromise, that so called violently independent music force is spent and it's time to look for something else.

And now for my last complaint: what have you got against heavy metal? I agree the majority of the bands are crap but you seem to go out of your way to attack it. For your information there are some hard rock groups that kick ass such as Motorhead, Aerosmith, Blue Cheer, AC/DC, Blackmore's Rainbow and Black Sabbath, not to mention The Reds or Destroy All Monsters.

Me and my friends are going to see The Clash in San Diego this week to rock our asses off. Hopefully they'll turn our safe American home into a white riot. George, San Bernadino, California.

And now a message from our sponsor — MB.

I ain't all this music stuff so much FUN!!! From... A sperm whale trying to come to terms with itself, somewhere near the western spiral arm.

The Marketing Department of WEA Records should be made to forego certain luxuries (e.g. food and drink) for a period of time sufficient for them to realise their utter stupidity in packaging Fleetwood Mac's 'Tusk' album in so much unnecessary, glossy, endangered raw material. Fleetwood Mac should be made to forego certain luxuries (e.g. powdered, white substances) for adding to the world's oil shortage by producing so much rubbish on so many pieces of vinyl. Laurence (Neil's friend), Hendon.

You must be one of the 'too hip' people I keep on reading about — MB.

How long will it take NME to discover the Skiffle revival? Surely it's obvious that the mod revival just hasn't taken off. The music of tomorrow is Skiffle, and the Fruitbats are proud to be at the forefront of the Skiffle revival.

Long live Skiffle. Long live the Fruitbats. Ferdy and the Fruitbats, Hereford.

Gavin Martin is absolutely right when he says that "The Stranglers are criminally vulgar, violent and voracious" (Live, 13th October). I have just been to The Stranglers concert at Leeds University where I was chased half-way down the hall by a beaser Jean Jacques Burnel. Even six bouncers and Hugh Cornwell couldn't restrain the maniac.

What outrageous crime did I commit? Did I throw a half full beer can or a broken bottle? No! All I did was spit at him. It's lucky for both of us that I managed to escape from the deadly hands of the black belt frog, otherwise I would probably be in two pieces and JJ would be down the local nick charged with GBH.

OK so spitting isn't a very hygienic and nice thing to do, but The Stranglers are a punk group and should be used to it and take it like men. Also I paid £2.50 out of my minute student grant to see them so I should be able to do what I like.

Incidentally, the concert was brilliant, the high spot being "Curfew" and the low spot being a 20 minute power failure near the end.

You can print my name and address as I'm not afraid of JJ. Someone needs to knock some sense into his head before he really goes over the top which would be the end of The Stranglers who contribute a vital part to our music industry.

Robert MacDermott, Leeds 3. The correct psycho-medical term for your condition is masochist. On the other hand if you aren't afraid of the popular Frenchman why did you run away from him. Somebody isn't telling the truth. — MB.

If Bing Crosby plays Sheffield on his next tour, Ladbrokes are going to owe me a lot of money.

M. Python, NFA. Bing? — MB.

Please tell those Hare Krishna bastards to stop singing and pissing about down Oxford Street. (Bloody worse than the Scotland fans.) Thank you. Paul Monaghan, British Boxing Board of Control, London W1. I like Red Indians, white man. — MB (rama rama).

Please put more pictures of John Cooper Clarke in the NME. He is delicious.

T-ZERS

Heads! Rats, tails, OK I'll break. Pow! So what's that, stripes? Alright you're on spots, and it's two away seen' as how we just potted the white. Hey, listen I'm not trying to put you off your shot but did you know that the amazing Radar Records label appears to be on its beam ends. Yup, the centre slip that brought you Costello, Lowe and Richard (it's) Hell (in there), looks set to follow the Titanic and Scotland's Argentina project into oblivion. A major financial shuffle that has so far resulted in two company directors being "bought out" is creating a cloud of mystery surrounding the future of the not so stable label, Mabel! A call to the halls of distress themselves merely resulted in a terse "ask Warners, the ball is in their court". Those daffy mothers at Warner Brothers insisted that Radar are not bankrupt as such but still couldn't clarify vis a vis Radar Records' 1980 plans. In the meantime The Pop Group smile crazily, and Jake Riviera shouldn't throw that black hat away just yet. Shucks, all this just as Warn. Bros are to spatter millions out on the largest campaign ever to promote the new Fleetwood Mac album. Tusk, tusk, tusk...

Keith Richards — I think you just nudged one of my stripes — Keith Richards can at last sleep easy. Five judges of the Ontario Court of Appeals finally and unanimously rejected a bid by some government bods to get the grizzled old guitarist put in a crossfeet suit following the great escape from his Canada bust bore...

Stocks and chairs: Public humiliation for Bruce Springsteen's gal Lynn Goldsmith, the rock photographer. Seems that Broooo — (That's enough — Ed) boose had given her orders not to snap him at the Madison Square gig and then spotted her flashing away in the twelfth row as he performed. Leaping from the stage he grabbed her arm and hauling her onto the boards announced to all present "This is my EX-girlfriend, OK!" and then shoved her into the wings. Ms Goldsmith refused to comment on the punishment but The Brute later mumbled: "It was my birthday and I was havin' a great time then I saw her doing somethin' she said she wouldn't... she ignored my earlier signs so I had to do it myself." Sharp intake of breath...

Neatly holing the blue and coming back for an easy orange, T-Zers delivers a couple of home truths. Firstly, we hear that The Undertones were happy to receive Paul Rambali's slice of hate mail over their re-issue LP, "At last," quoth the dizzy Irishmen, "somebody hates us. We were beginning to worry!" Secondly, some of the less discerning readers may have noticed Melody Maker attempting to pooch-pooch our Cook & Jones activity Thrill of a couple of weeks back. Getting a few dull quotes from somebody called Fachtna O'Kelly — the dull duo's newly acquired manager — they misled their readers to believe that C&J had been doin' no more than a couple of demos and that our story was just so much space. Well, Nick Kent did, uh, sit in at the sessions in question and if anyone believes that the pair still need to cut demos for Virgin approval, well... Anyway, Jones has now booked time into Wessex Studios in order to go further with the workouts. The new bassist is Andy Allen — son of Elkan Allen who once produced a show called Ready, Steady, Go! — who it turns out also played bass for parts of the 'Rock and Roll Swindle' album because Sid V's playing was too experimental for the public consumption...

Enough of these long ones! On with the gimmicks. Hugh Cornwell, the well known Strangler, will be opening a pub for his mates in Bath. Although at present the ale-house rejoices under the name Royal Oak, it is hoped they can get a deed poll type change to make it — wait for this — The Brain Surgery. Seems daft, right? Then again, the local brewers are called Brains or summat...

America the brave. Talking Heads not overly pleased that the title of their excellent new single 'Life During Wartime' is being changed in order to please U.S. radio moguls. The big-wigs feel the original is too, too depressing...

The seen scene: At the Yellow Magic gig at the Venue in London Scott Gorman, Phil Lynott and Tom Robinson all checked the miniature yellow electronic Japs. More significantly, Gary Numan also stuck his snout in and absorbed some of the wing, ping and dribble...

Let's just hope they haven't bought any tickets to see The Ohio Players at the same joint.

(Bought? He! — Ed). Because, hell, the Players won't be showin' their ass round' this mo'fo' country no mo'. Shi-er, some Gard-dayim mo' an' fled with an advance from the Venue an' thus left the band so financially embarrassed they faw-essed to cry-nceal...

Even more crime. Rock's only genuine thousand-year-old man B.P. Fallon was fined £150 in Brum for spray painting a wall. Also along with him was Dave MacMasters of Proteus who pleaded not guilty and thus Heseyyyyyyyyyy! Ahr-i-i-i-ghht! Rock and roll!!!!!! Why let a little thing like bacterial endocarditis prevent you from rilly, rilly gittin' down and enjoying a 21st birthday party with your friends? Just take a tip from Joan Jett, rock singer. Joan's been in a Los Angeles hospital for six weeks now, but she doesn't let a little thing like a dripleed hang her up. Joan's courage shines out to all us snivelling Jimmies like some pint-size beacon and we look forward to a speedy recovery so that she can get back to doing whatever it is that she does that makes her important enough to get her pic in NME. Photo: Donna Santisi.

has to show up again later this month to see if anyone believes him...

Siouxsie and The Banshees saw fit to ban all Polydor personnel from the backstage area at their Hammersmith Odeon gig recently. Likewise for the apres-gig party which for some reason was held in Peckham, SE London. Naturally the ubiquitous Cook and Jones were there plus Paul's mum (the big girl's blouse)...

What do they feed them over there? A young American swam across the Mississippi River recently. (Fact: It takes almost 90 minutes to do this worthwhile act). Upon arriving at the far bank he announced: "I did it for Linda Ronstadt. I'm a desperado. She'll understand!"

Tales of people on tour in the USA. Only Ones — you remember The Only Ones — guitarist John Perry got arrested for speeding (with a car) in Minnesota and spent the night in jail with a selection of junkies, pimps, murderers and child molesters all of whom demanded to be transferred to another prison when they learned his identity. Later the band witnessed a small plane crash into a pylon near Atlanta. And best of all, in Birmingham, Alabama an irate club owner told them to turn down or scream. Thumbing their noses — at least we think they were thumbing their noses — at the fat man, they carried on regardless. A short while later a bunch of rednecks wielding baseball bats and assorted lengths of timber began assembling in front of the stage. The police were called and order maintained...

Far, far out Bob Dylan appeared on the US network Saturday Night Live TV show playing live on the gogglebox for the first time since Hyde Park was a flower pot. He played 'You've Got To Serve Somebody' but didn't say anything. Praise the Lord so soon...

Oh and if in the excitement you wondered what became of our pool game, well a keen eyed T-Zer just potted that elusive black five minutes ago. So it's nail-biting time in the Valleys as Ted Lowe once said. Mugs away...
