NEWS

Xmas Tour Circuit

XTC begin another series of UK dates in two weeks' time, conveniently coinciding with the chart success of their Virgin single 'Making Plans For Nigel'. Then, after a whirlwind European tour during the first half of December, they return home to play a string of Christmas shows.

Initial dates set by John Giddings of MAM are Nottingham University (November 23), Birmingham University (24), Reading Hexagon Theatre (25), Canterbury Odeon (26), Norwich Cromwells (27), Manchester University (28), Slough Langley College (30), Plymouth Polytechnic (December 1), Poole Arts Centre (2) and Colchester Essex University (3).

The band then fly off to Europe for gigs in Germany, Scandinavia, Holland, Belgium and France, returning to headline a Christmas show at London Camden Music Machine on December 20. They are also the stars of the Christmas Party at Aylesbury Friars (22), and finally they play a hometown gig at Swindon Brunel Rooms (23).

As reported last week, XTC are also being negotiated for an appearance in the two week 'More Front Row Festivities' event at London Kensington Nashville, and — if this is confirmed — it will be on December 21. In the New Year, the band are off to the States.

CURE HEADLINING

THE CURE, fresh from their tour with Siouxsie & The Banshees, are about to go on the road again, this time as the headline attraction. And the outing will also introduce their changed and augmented line-up — because bassist Michael Dempsey has now left the band, and he's been replaced by two new members, Simon Gallup (bass) and Matthew Hartley (keyboards).

The band's last dates in Britain until March are Liverpool Eric's (November 16), London School of Economics (17), Preston Polytechnic (20), Manchester University (21), Bradford Palm Cove (22), Newport The Village (23), Coventry Warwick University (24), Sheffield University (27), Birmingham University (28), Portsmouth Polytechnic (29), Norwich East Anglia University (30), Durham University (December 1), Wolverhampton Polytechnic (5), London Camden

Music Machine (6) and Crawley College (7).

Support acts on all dates except Newport (where The Cure appear solo) are the band's Fiction Records label-mates The Passions and new MCA signings The Associates. Ticket prices at all venues will be a maximum £1.60, except for a £2 admission at the Music Machine. After these dates, The Cure begin an 11-date European tour, before returning to start work on their follow-up album to 'Three Imaginary Boys'. They're scheduled to make their US debut in late January.

● Dempsey told NME that he had been sacked by the band, but didn't know the reason why. He added: "I suppose you could call it a clash of personalities, but I was definitely booted out, and I'm now looking for another gig."

Return of The Dickies

THE DICKIES have now confirmed seven dates for their short British tour, plans for which were reported last week, and there's every chance that two or three more will be added. Their visit follows a European tour with The Stranglers, and the band appear at Newcastle City Hall (November 29), Hanley Victoria Hall (30), Bristol Locarno (December 2), London Marquee (4), Carlisle Market Hall (6), Edinburgh Odeon (7) and Blackburn King George's Hall (7). Ticket prices will range between £1.75 and £2.75. Their new album is 'Dawn Of The Dickies', from which comes their latest single, 'Manny, Moe And Jack' — both released by A&M this weekend.

Band on the UK run

WINGS ARE FLYING

THE LONG-AWAITED Wings tour has finally come together! They'll be playing a series of 16 major concerts around the country, including five in London, from November 25 to December 17. And although they played three shows at Wembley in 1976, this will be their first full tour here for four years.

Dates are Liverpool Royal Court Theatre (November 25 and 26), Manchester Apollo (28 and 29), Southampton Gaumont (December 1), Brighton Centre (2), London Lewisham Odeon (3), London Rainbow Theatre (5), London Wembley Arena (7, 8 and 9), Birmingham Odeon (12), Newcastle City Hall (14), Edinburgh Odeon (15) and Glasgow Apollo (16 and 17). It seems likely that additional dates will be slotted in at some of these venues, and gaps have been left in the schedule to accommodate these.

The tour will mark the live debut of the two new Wings members, Laurence Juber (guitar) and Steve Holly (drums), who joined the nucleus of Paul and Linda McCartney and Denny Laine late last year. They will be augmented on stage by a horn section.

Ticket prices for all concerts are £5.50, £5 and £4.50 — except Wembley (£5.50 and £5 only). They go on sale at box-offices only at 10 am this Sunday (November 11), and are restricted to four per applicant — the only exception to this is Liverpool, where they are being sold from noon this Sunday at Radio City reception.

Wembley tickets are also available by post until November 15 from Wings Concert, P.O. Box 47L, London W1A 4TL — postal orders only, four tickets per application and enclose SAE. Tickets for Lewisham, the Rainbow and Wembley may also be purchased from the Ticket Machine at the Virgin Megastore in Oxford Street, again from this Sunday.

Blondie here Xmas into 1980

BLONDIE'S eagerly-awaited British visit now seems certain to take place before the end of the year. And their concerts won't be confined to London alone — they'll also be playing at other major venues around the country. NME understands that the band will be here over both Christmas and New Year, gigging for best part of three weeks, opening on either December 23 or Christmas Eve. Dates are at present being finalised, and are expected to be announced in a week or two.

JOHN COOPER CLARKE has added another eight dates to his UK tour reported two weeks ago, making 24 gigs in all — they are Swansea Cricles (November 19), Leeds Fan Club (20), Leicester University (23), Norwich East Anglia University (27), Portsmouth Art College (December 4), Edinburgh Tiffin's (10), Aberdeen Ruffles (11) and Glasgow Technical College (12). Chris Sivey & The Freshies and The Out support throughout the tour.

ADAM & THE ANTS are planning an extensive New Year tour of the UK, despite the recent loss (as reported in T-Zers last week) of two members — Andy Warren (bass) and Matthew (guitar). They're even hoping to arrange a date at a major London venue before Christmas, if replacements can be found in time. Meanwhile, the band's debut album 'Dirk Wears White Sox' is scheduled for November 30 release on Do It Records.

THE POP GROUP, now featuring new bassist Danny Catliss, have left Warner Brothers and have their first Rough Trade single out this week — titled 'We are all Prostitutes', it's dedicated "to all anarchists and terrorists". The band are about to begin a series of UK dates, the first two confirmed being at London University Union with Scritti Politti (November 16) and Liverpool Eric's (December 1).

POLICE: LONDON DECEMBER GIGS

THE POLICE return from their triumphant U.S. tour to play two special Christmas concerts in London — at the Hammersmith Palais on December 18 (all tickets £3) and the Rainbow Theatre on December 19 (tickets £3, £2.50 and £2). Prior to this, they can be seen in BBC-2's 'Old Grey Whistle Test' next Tuesday (13) — they were filmed two weeks ago, performing several numbers at the Gussman Theatre in Miami.

Shirts due

THE SHIRTS are returning to Britain next month. They had originally intended gigging here in late November, at the outset of a European tour — but they've now revised their schedule in order to visit the UK closer to Christmas. The Bron Agency is currently lining up their dates, which hopefully will be ready for announcement next week.

THE B52s play a one-off London date this month, as part of a whirlwind European tour — with one gig in each country. It's at Camden Electric Ballroom on Thursday, November 15, and the support groups are The Searchers and The V.I.P.s. Tickets are on sale now at £3 each, and promoters are Straight Music.

FINGERPRINTZ, who've been guesting on The Skids' tour, play four London gigs in their own right to promote their first Virgin album 'The Very Dab' — at Camden Music Machine (November 14), Covent Garden Rock Garden (15), West Hampstead Moonlight Club (17) and Clapham 101 Club (18).

THE SPECIALS and THE SELECTER, already set to climax their current tour at London Strand Lyceum on November 25, will now also appear at the same venue the following Sunday, December 2 (tickets £3).

999 are being lined up for a full British tour in January (details to follow shortly), to coincide with the release of their third album, which they're currently recording. The provisional title is 'The Biggest Prize In Sport'.

PUNISHMENT OF LUXURY have been re-joined by guitarist Malacaballa, who was one of their original founder members, along with Nevil Luxury and Brian Bond, but who subsequently left to work with a local Newcastle band. He's now back in the Punilux fold to augment the line-up, and is already rehearsing with them for their new album and tour, both due early next year. SQUEEZE, whose abbreviated UK tour opens next week (see Gig Guide), are releasing a new single to coincide. And (would you believe?) it's a Christmas song! Titled 'Christmas Day' and described as "an up-dated version of The Nativity", it's issued by A&M on November 23.

THE DAMNED have added three dates to their previously reported UK tour — at Brighton Top Rank (November 28), Bristol Colston Hall (December 11) and Hull City Hall (15), and they have switched their November 26 gig from Plymouth Fiesta to Sheffield Top Rank. A three-track single, on which the main title is 'I Just Can't Be Happy Today' from their current album, is issued by Chiswick on November 16.

GANG OF FOUR open their tour at Aylesbury Friars this Saturday (10), after cancelling the first seven projected gigs due to injuries sustained by Andrew Gill and Jon King, who were attacked when leaving a club in Leeds. The rest of the tour goes ahead as scheduled, and cancelled shows will be re-set.

RUTS

VINTAGE PRESLEY ELPEE

'ELVIS, Scotty and Bill' is the title of a collectors-item LP issued by Virgin on November 30. It contains what are believed to be the first live recordings by the 19-year-old Elvis Presley, with guitarist Scotty Moore and drummer Bill Black. There's also a narrative of the first year of his career, plus a 1956 Presley interview, it comes in gatefold sleeve with a 12-page booklet, priced £8.99.

LATEST OLDFIELD ALBUM

MIKE OLDFIELD has a new studio album issued by Virgin on November 23, titled 'Platinum'. Produced by Tom Newman, who worked with Oldfield on 'Tubular Bells' and 'Hergest Ridge', it features a number of backing musicians — although, as usual, Oldfield was himself responsible for writing and playing the majority of the music. The live tracks are 'Platinum', 'Woodchopper', 'Sally', 'Punkadiddle' and 'I Got Rhythm'.

● MCA/Infinity release five strong 12-inch disc singles this month, under the collective title of 'Our Hot 12 Inches'. Besides 'Dancing In Outer Space' by Atmosfear (reported last week), issues this weekend are 'Cordon Bleu' by Crusaders drummer Sibs Hooper, 'Music' by Al Hudson and 'Do You Love What You Feel' by Rufus and Chaka Khan. Following on November 16 is 'I Just Can't Control Myself' by Nature's Divine. ● Cherry Red Records issue their second compilation album on November 16, following their 'Business Unusual' set in January. Titled 'Labels Unlimited' (£4.25), it features 16 bands performing tracks which were all previously released as singles on various independent labels. Among the outfits involved are Girlschool, The Piranhas, Crisis, Newtown Neurotics, Biza Marx, Scissor Fits, Those Naughty Lumps and Spizz Oil.

Record News

BEE GEES JOIN No.1 CHRISTMAS CHASE

THE BEE GEES have joined Abba and Rod Stewart in the battle to secure the top album for the coming Christmas season. As reported, 'Abba Greatest Hits Volume 2' and 'Rod Stewart's Greatest Hits Volume 1' looked to be the main contenders, but now they've been joined by a third challenger — which could conceivably oust the other two. It's the double LP 'Bee Gees Greatest', released this week by RSO. It contains 20 titles, including many of their classic songs from the past, plus a few tracks never before issued on any Bee Gees album.

● And battle was joined this week, with the news from Epic that the Abba set had chalked up 600,000 advance orders — which means that it shipped double platinum even before its official release date. Follow that!

● A possible fourth contender for the coveted Xmas best seller spot emerges on November 23, when Atlantic releases the 'Best Of Chic' compilation, containing all their hit singles.

● Tom Petty and The Heartbreakers' single 'Here Comes My Girl/Don't Bring Me Down' is issued by MCA tomorrow (Friday), the same day as the album from which the A-side is taken 'Damn The Torpedoes'. A 12-inch version follows on November 23 and, besides an extended version of the main title, it also has an extra track called 'Cora Dega'.

● Voyager are back in the studios with producer Gus Duggee recording their second Mountain album 'Act Of Love', for February release. It will be preceded in January by the single 'Sing Out — Love Is Easy', and the band plan a UK tour in March.

● In view of the recent TV strike and the consequent lack of available promotion, Polydor reissue Billy Connolly's single 'In The Brownies' this weekend. Scheduled for November 16 is 'Roller Skatin' Mate' by Peaches And Herb and '130 Beats A Minute' by The Olympic Runners. Singles out on the affiliated Fiction label this week are 'Jumpin' Someone Else's Train' by The Cure and 'Frustrations' by The Purple Hearts.

● Dutch label Fluxus now has six singles available in the UK through Rough Trade and other independent outlets. They are 'Poly Vinyl' by The Mummies, 'Bizarre Disco' by Interior, 'Sexy Pyromas' by Ze Popes, 'Drastring Measures' by Minny Pops, 'Alpha Jorks' by The Twinkies and 'Fanny' by The Tapes. ● A new Dr. Hook album 'Sometimes You Win' is rushed out by Capitol this weekend, to be followed on November 30 by their follow-up single 'Better Love Next Time'.

● Rachel Sweet has a new single titled 'Baby Let's Play House' issued by Stiff on November 19, as the prelude to a UK tour currently being lined up.

● Public Image Limited's album 'Metal Box' — consisting of three 12-inch 45rpm records packed in a metal container — is now officially set for November 23 release by Virgin. The first 50,000 copies will be marketed in this unconventional form, selling at £5.99.

● Tiger Ashby have just recorded their first single for Alien Records, titled 'Status Of Liberty', and they'll be touring in January to promote it.

● Phil Daniels, best known for his starring roles in the film 'Quadrophonia' and 'Scum', has in fact been playing with a band called The Cross for about six years — though their recent activities have been restricted by Daniels' movie commitments. But they've now signed with RCA, who this month release their first album 'Phil Daniels And The Cross' and single 'Kill Another Night'.

● Australian punk refugees The Last Words have just finished recording their new single 'Today's Kids', for December release by Rough Trade. They'll also be doing some dates this month as support to UK Subs.

SPRINGSTEEN, PETTY AND TOSH ON IN-CONCERT LP

BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, Tom Petty, Peter Tosh and Jackson Browne are among those featured on a double album, to be issued by Elektra next month, culled from the recent concerts at New York's Madison Square Garden in aid of Musicians United For Safe Energy. Also taking part are Ry Cooder, The Doobie Brothers, Graham Nash, Bonnie Raitt, James Taylor, Carly Simon, Poco, Gil Scott-Heron, John Prine and Jesse Colin Young. The set contains a 16-page booklet, and a film of the concerts is also planned.

MUZAK BY M

M — whose single 'Pop Muzik' topped the UK charts in May, and is currently a smash hit in the States — have their follow-up issued by MCA this weekend, titled 'Moonlight And Muzik'. It's taken from their upcoming debut album 'New York, London, Paris, Munich', scheduled for November 30 release.

ELP in concert

A NEW ALBUM from Emerson, Lake & Palmer titled 'In Concert' is rush released this week by Atlantic — though exactly why it's a rush, considering it was recorded during their 1977 U.S. tour, isn't quite clear! Backing features a 60-piece orchestra and six vocalists, and among the seven tracks are Keith Emerson's Piano Concerto and the classic 'Pictures At An Exhibition'.

● Johnny Curious is back on the scene this week with the release of his single 'Someone Else's Home' on Bugle Records, distributed by Rough Trade and other indie. Or by post at £1 including p&h from Huw Davies, 7 Carrington Close, Boreham Wood, Herts. Curious plans to return to the gig circuit within the next few weeks.

● Oval Records have ended their production deal with A&M, and all their future products will be distributed by Spartan. Singles this month include 'I Think I Think Too Much' by Ed Sime and 'Rhythm On The Radio' by A.B.C.

● Cuddly Toys, a band with a loyal following on the London club circuit, have had their debut album 'Guillotine Theatre' and a single called 'Madman' released — but only in Japan! Cuddly, no deal has yet been made for UK release, so the band are arranging for import copies to be made available shortly.

BAKER'S DOZEN

GINGER BAKER has lined up a string of dates for his new band Energy. Starting later this month, they'll be on the road until the end of January, closing at a major London venue — and they then set out on an extensive European tour. They are at present recording enough material for two albums, although no release is planned until the spring. With many more to follow, the first 13 confirmed dates are:

St Austell New Cornish Riviera (November 24), Bolton Aquarius (28), Scarborough Penthouse (29), Norwich Cromwells (December 3), Manchester Polytechnic (6), Leeds Cosmo Club (5), Shrewsbury Music Hall (6), Newport The Village (7), London Chelsea College (8), Bristol Granary (13), Wolverhampton Lafayette (14), Bedford Porterhouse (15) and Folkestone Leas Cliff Hall (22).

"People thought just because we played like

BLUE Oyster Cult flew into England on the night of Halloween. I strapped on my invisible guitar, scattered wolf-bane about the door, and set off to meet the consummate practitioners of rock alchemy. A heavy metal band for people who don't like heavy metal.

The Cult have forged a perverse union of myth and riff that has adapted and sustained itself for the best part of ten years. Their early records, made under the spell of producer and historian Memphis Sam Pearlman, sought nothing less than total world guitar apocalypse, and spoke of matters hideous in the true Lovecraftian sense. They were pitched between the sublime and the ridiculous; between The Doors and Black Sabbath.

Being a fan of the Blue Oyster Cult in those days carried with it the same sort of responsibilities as did being a New York Dolls fan: you knew how to recognise and venerate the truly extreme, but you tacitly understood the humour involved, and you could look at bogus fools like Alice Cooper and quite rightly laugh.

However, actually being the Blue Oyster Cult in those days had its penalties. Not everyone appreciated what was going on. A literate heavy metal band was then, as now, a contradiction in terms.

Most heavy metal bands find themselves scorned by the critics and adored by their followers. Blue Oyster Cult found themselves praised by the critics but followed by mostly a small core of lunatic and the dispossessed: bikers, acid casualties, comic buffs, misfits all.

In more ways than one a fringe outfit, Blue Oyster Cult have long operated on strictly democratic lines. All five contribute a more or less equal share of the songs, with drummer Albert Bouchard — quick-witted and open man upon whom easily falls the task of spokesman — slightly ahead on points.

All group decisions are made communally and rewards are likewise shared. "It's extremely inefficient," admits Bouchard, "but then we all stay in the same hotel too..."

And it's played a crucial part in their longevity — a quality much prized amongst the breed of fan who likes to wear the symbol of devotion embroidered on their back (and perhaps that's why; embroidery is a time-consuming business).

The group own up to feeling something in common with the bands who figure on denim jackets — a peculiar anomaly in the eyes of their critical admirers, who view the likes of Rush with deep suspicion.

But while the Cult mine the darker side of metal riff fantasy, their musical inspirations are shared with those bands. They are ardent Anglophiles, and their anticipation still runs high when Led Zeppelin release an album.

Otherwise, their interests are atypical. Eric Bloom reads up to three science fiction novels a week and classes himself "one of the world's biggest sci-fi movie fans." Albert Bouchard subscribes to the more outré French and American comics. Allen Lanier, Patti Smith's former beau, is an avid reader of Raymond Chandler, and Donald Roeser harbours a fascination for the vampire myth. When Stephen King, author of Carrie and Salem's Lot, contacted him for permission to quote "Don't Fear The Reaper" in a new book, Roeser was — so to speak — over the moon.

THE Cult made three albums in the first phase of their existence, 'Blue Oyster Cult', 'Tyranny And Mutation' and 'Secret Treaties', all adorned with strange cyphers, each progressively more lucid an exposition

Yes it's the Winfield Wall of Guitars again. And again. And...

"Well we're not," claim the Cult. "Wouldn't of what were to a certain extent Pearlman's ideas, and each more deranged than the last.

Titles like 'The Red And The Black' (long before anarchy entered its recent vogue), 'O'D On Life Itself', 'Hot Rails To Hell', 'Career Of Evil', 'Dominance And Submission' and 'Astronomy' will forever linger in the minds of alumni of diseased works.

But disenchantment set in when the audiences persistently failed to materialise as per Pearlman's plan, and Blue Oyster Cult did what every self-respecting hard rock band does at times of impasse: they tried to assert their market with a kick ass live double album.

"We felt it would be our 'Allman Brothers at The Fillmore East'; show everybody we were really a people's band," Bouchard's voice betrays a weary resignation. He is obviously bemused by the memory.

"There was a big change happening in the group at that time. We got tired of being so hard-nosed all the time. We did all the stuff, especially 'Secret Treaties' and people were calling us Nazis! They had no sense of humour about it — and I'm being very serious now. This is not very funny: they were taking us seriously and it was horrifying for us. We felt that... We didn't have a choice; people didn't understand us. It may look like a political rally but it's not."

"Our real logic behind that live album — which in retrospect I don't think really worked — was that... we'd got this reputation as a critics' band and that just drove us crazy because the kids are what it's about. You go out there and get them standing up and jumping along and that's what really feels good. If the review is good or bad it doesn't matter. With the kids there's no problem, no worry about whether they understand it or not."

So they estranged all but the most irredeemably gonzo headbanger with the ultimate four-sided orgy of volume, guitars, smoke and all-round Hell-bent metal mayhem called — and it showed real class to get this gauche — 'On Your Feet... Or On Your Knees'.

FOUR years and four albums later the Cult have been forced once again to take stock: to fall back and re-group around their core assets.

They're commencing their second and most comprehensive British tour, without the expensive battery of laser effects they brought with them last time, but with a renewed commitment to live rock action. The mood as they begin is one of optimism shrouded with uncertainty. If this tour fails to build on their support, chances and finances are such they won't be coming back.

Only Eric Bloom, their bearded, business-like vocalist, shows a hint of remorse at the loss of the lasers, though he is quick to support the practical reasons for getting rid of them.

"They cost 500 dollars a week to operate and whenever one of them went wrong, which was often, it cost another two or three grand straightaway to get it fixed. I don't really miss them," he shrugs, "though I kinda liked my wrist laser..."

The fireworks they ignominiously use in place of the costly lasers were delayed for the first show at Brighton, much to Bloom's displeasure, since he was already thwarted by Council regulations in his plans to bring over his pride and joy, a chopper he rides on stage during 'Golden Age Of Leather', the Cult's astounding biker requiem, constructed like a sonic narrative poem.

"It's great," he enthuses, "it's a 1300cc factory chopper that was given to me by Harley-Davidson and it's got a mike attached to the tail-pipe!"

Later on Bloom confesses that... "When this winds down, I'm going to get into films. I've already hired an agent to find me a part, and I've asked all my connections in the music business to look out for a suitable vehicle."

My favourite memory of Eric Bloom: the one where he climbed onto the drum riser to do a parlour trick with a flash-bomb. He hurls a bolt of mystical lightning with a dramatic flourish but the flash-bomb doesn't work, to his ill-disguised dismay. A wizard? A true ham. Bloom's brave vanity in the face of almost overwhelming odds reveals a wondrous lack of sensitivity.

The decision to ditch the lasers was part financial and part ideological. They played a string of small club dates during the making of their last album and suddenly remembered why they became Blue Oyster Cult in the first place.

"We also got fed up of hearing ourselves billed as the world's most amazing laser show," says Bloom, "without even a mention of the band."

Don't you ever get fed up of using the lights and fireworks too? Why, I ask Bouchard, don't you take it the whole way?

"Up to a point. It's not as bad now as it used to be. They've really become secondary to what we want to do. And if they can't fit in then okay, fine."

"But that's only like 90 seconds of a two-hour show," argues Bloom. "It's not a big deal."

"It just happens to come at the most climactic moments," admits Bouchard sardonically.

you be happier if you were?" asks Paul Rambali

The FX obviously mean a lot less to him than to Bloom, and he agrees that it becomes hard to tell exactly what is causing the climax after a while. So doesn't he tire of these ritual climaxes? Wouldn't he like to make it all a bit looser?

"That is true. We would like to. The ritual is okay, but we do feel sometimes that we'd like to play something off-the-wall. We tried it, with Cream's 'I Feel Free', and no matter how good it came out, the kids didn't like it. They didn't know what it was, and those who did turned their noses up.

"We do some crazy things. We didn't do any tonight because we had problems with equipment, but when things go smoothly we get looser."

And then I concede that our purposes are crossed. They think I'm asking them to rock out and take a chance with material whereas I only want them to subvert the premise upon which a ten year touring career has been built.

THE Cult's ambitions have led them astray. After the deadlock that their early albums created they abandoned Pearlman's concepts and allowed their individual ideas to come through more fully on 'Agents Of Fortune' — a startling record that few hitherto thought them capable of. Each song contained vivid and poignant imagery, each was crafted with the care and detail of the finest short story, and they were all different. There wasn't a single superfluous moment from start to finish. 'Agents' is an album of the decade — it found the Cult making music most bands wouldn't even dream of.

Fortune dealt them an ace from the pack in Donald Roeser's song of the supernatural, 'Don't Fear The Reaper'. They set the scene with typical eloquence, singing in tombstone harmony opening words that would turn out to be prophetic and, finally, ironic: "All... our times... have... come."

'Reaper' removed the stigma of the last part of their name and seemed to open the gates to the stadium supershows of their British hard rock heroes, The Who and Led Zeppelin. It was, they wearily admit, a false lead, and one they've only just given up trying to follow.

"If the 'Reaper' hadn't appeared on that record," says Bloom, "to tell you the truth I don't know if we would be here today, financially speaking. All of a sudden we actually found ourselves making a living, which we were amazed at."

"All of a sudden it didn't matter that I didn't finish engineering school," exclaims Bouchard.

"Agents" was the first mega-buck album for us. That's why it was so different. We were able to do a lot of overdubs and capture the true Beach Boys sound! But the next record, 'Spectres' was really the height of studio-itis. It proved to us that you could overdo it because some of the stuff started out better than it turned out. We were still stymied as to why 'Spectres' didn't go to number one and blow Fleetwood Mac off the charts."

Though technically superior to 'Agents', and blessed with songs as good as 'Golden Age Of Leather' and the aural B-movie of 'Godzilla', 'Spectres' was polished to the point of eroding some of the vitality of 'Agents'. And with 'Nosferatu', 'I Love The Night' and the eerie cover the Cult seemed a little too keen to play their new commercial card.

"Maybe as far as our audience is concerned we did. But we were interested in exploring more of a stock, romantic type thing. Blue Oyster Cult as heroes as opposed to anti-heroes."

"My opinion of us now is that we are or we should be the Poe of Rock. Nobody is really seriously into that except for us and I believe we should take advantage of it. But it's not that easy to come up with a good blend of those elements; one that isn't just gratuitously scary. I don't think we've really put our energies into that over the past couple of years, but now we don't feel so inclined to chase the hits because even though the records haven't sold as well, the audiences in the States are bigger than ever and a lot of favourite stuff is the older material."

"When we made the latest album ('Mirrors') we were still thinking that hit singles were where it was at because we'd had this big success with 'Reaper' and sold so many records. So on 'Mirrors' consequently there have been a bunch of out and out pop songs: 'Mirrors', 'In Thee', 'You're Not The One I Was Looking For'. On 'Spectres' we had a few straight pop songs too, and the inability of those songs to catch on has shown us that we can't get away with it. We have to work within our genre — we don't have to be hard-nosed about it, but..."

"Donald insisted, before he did 'Reaper' he swore up and down to us that the only way to make any money was to have a hit single, and we all said bullshit. So he wrote 'Reaper' and we found out he was right, but it's not as simple as he was thinking, it was much more complicated..."

'Mirrors' is the least memorable of all Blue Oyster Cult albums excepting perhaps the first. It catches them at what sounds like a distinctly low ebb. It's also their first record with neither Pearlman nor an arranger friend of the band called David Lucas in tow, a development many Cultophiles can't see the merits of. Ted Nugent and Cheap Trick producer Tom Werman was an obvious choice from angle of CBS corporate mentality, though Werman's idea of a good production is simply to double everything up. On the subject of Werman, the Cult maintain a diplomatic silence, but as for Pearlman...

"You want the truth?" asks Bouchard. "I think there was a lack of confidence in his abilities, or everybody was disagreeing over what his abilities were. They just stopped believing in him. That's not necessarily my opinion, but that's what the whole thing added up to."

Bouchard has a better relationship with Pearlman than perhaps do the rest of the band, having written numerous songs with him, including a song cycle called 'The Soft Doctor Of Imaginos', only one part of which, 'Astronomy', has ever surfaced on Cult disc. I venture that their democratic make-up must lead to some inevitable frustrations.

"Yes, but that's part of our strength and part of our weakness. That's always been Sandy Pearlman's way; he's never said 'Hey you're the star what shall we do?' He says 'Okay what do you guys want to do?' Then we start arguing and then he starts arguing... until we figure out what exactly is the majority opinion. If somebody hates something, and really doesn't want to do it, then we don't. And if somebody really loves something, they have to infuse the enthusiasm they have for it into everybody else. None of us are that egotistical about what we want to do, and there's no Chuck Berry in this group; someone who always writes the same kind of song. Everybody writes different kinds of songs."

"So solo projects are inevitable, because being a democracy you really can't do everything you want. We come up with these pop songs that are really good and because of the Cult image people say we're selling out, it's phoney and so forth. With this last record we said 'how do you have a hit?' You write about what's close to you emotionally, and that's what we did, and it didn't work."

"There's lots of things on the album that directly relate to us, that were inspired by the tragedies or whatever that happen to us. Allen's songs are both about Patti, 'Vigil' is about some friends of ours who are UFO-watchers, and it's as much about us and them as it is about them and UFOs. 'You're Not The One I Was Looking For' was written about Tom Werman..."

ALBERT Bouchard's frankness demands respect. So I'll be frank too and say the group has reached a point where they could well write their own autobiographical 'Golden Age Of Leather' — a requiem for the most outrageous and challenging and finally star-crossed hard rock band of them all.

They already plan to reduce their activities to leave them six months of the year free to pursue individual plans. Donald Roeser could easily make a very commercial album. Bouchard ought to make 'Imaginos' regardless of such concerns since it obviously means a lot to him. Allen Lanier could retreat to the bowels of New York and work with Tom Verlaine. And Eric Bloom could go off and fill the vacuum left by Alice Cooper — if he can find it.

But that's just one extrapolation. The best of all possible endings would be the one where the frayed denim armies cast out their rusty metal heroes and at last embrace the Blue Oyster Cult.

WE'VE ABSOLUTELY no income. The only income we did have was gigs — but that all went on expenses. They refused to give us any dole money because we were in a band."

The band being Another Pretty Face, half of whom quit a week or so before this interview, leaving guitarist John Caldwell, and singer/guitarist Mike Scott, who continues to detail their pecuniary difficulties. (Meanwhile, APF are working with a new rhythm section, drummer Steve McLaughlin and bassist Willie Kirkwood.)

"We were giving them accounts and things to prove that we're not earning anything. But they take so long. We've appealed against their decision and it's going to take six weeks."

John: "We're heavily in debt." Mike: "We owe Eugene (Reynolds) money. When we played in London with the Rezillos a lot of our gear got nicked. Eugene lent us some money towards getting new stuff. We owe Z (APF's manager) a couple of hundred quid... and our parents, 'cos they've kept us going. I'm going to have to phone my mum, get some more money." Mike trails off, smiling.

All that should soon be over, though, replaced by new problems with an imminent Virgin Records contract and national scrutiny. But they'll survive that, and enjoy it all too. Not only are APF easily amongst this year's best new bands, but their music will be accessible and satisfying to nearly anyone who ever liked electric guitars.

Besides, Mike's an idealist; still dumb enough to want to change the world with rock'n'roll. The music press will love him.

"We were in a group called Karma (John groans) in 1975, specialising in playing 'Moonage Daydream' and... but it had originals — we were writing then."

John: "We were only 16, Christ!"

Mike: "I was 15. And I'd already been writing for three years."

How many songs have you written?

university in Edinburgh "a total and utter waste of time", and decided to move back from Ayr in September '78 in search of musicians.

By February this year, having found nobody for a band, they decided to record a single anyway, and asked friends Crigg and Jim Geddes, to come up to play drums and bass. Both decided to stay.

Mike: "We did one gig, then recorded the single, then we did three more and released it. No one had ever heard of us."

Including me. I didn't buy the single, or even know they were from Edinburgh until a couple of months later, when a friend told me he was promoting some gigs for them. He hadn't seen them either, but an angel had come to him in a vision, and he liked their single.

The single was 'All The Boys Love Carrie'. It was wonderful. Still is. Even now it remains as thrilling and joyous as the best Buzzcocks, Undertones... whatever, though without the naivety. It rings.

Julie Burchill made it NME single of the week: "This song holds hints of a literary talent somewhere between F. Scott Fitz and Springsteen... a great little record."

Mike: "Well, I've never read F. Scott Fitzgerald..."

It's a compliment, honest.

"My mum's read him, and she said, 'Oh, I can see the similarity.' Springsteen definitely."

John: "He was fair chuffed." Former Rezillo William Mysterious played saxophone and produced the record. How did he get involved?

John: "Well, we interviewed The Rezillos once."

Mike: "Then we met him at a Simple Minds gig, and said 'Will you produce our single?'"

Since then he's become more deeply involved: plays sax and organ on demos, helps out with contract negotiations — "a sorta guiding light".

New Pleasures, Z's record company, recently put out a single by DNV, an old tape of an old band involving Mike and Crigg.

Mike: "It's just an old thing. We're not doing the songs any more, so why not bring it out just for posterity? That's about all there is to say."

Except... that it comprises one of Mike's songs called 'Death In Venice' and 'Mafia', a song found on a Patti Smith bootleg, though originally by Lloyd Parkes (currently Dennis Brown's bass player, my sources insist). More raucous than 'Carrie', but still excellent. 'Mafia' matches any other attempts at white reggae.

And what do they do now they've finally got that record contract? The 'artistic control' we keep hearing about...

Mike: "The control we have over things like that will be governed by the amount of interest we take in it. We're writing the songs, and we have such a vivid idea of what the songs are about we know what the cover of 'Whatever Happened To The West?' (proposed next single) should look like, or whatever..."

"We take a lot of care about lyrics. There's one called 'The Kids Are Back' — 'If you've got a flag, why don't you wave it?' — that sort of holds the key to all our lyrics. If you feel about something why don't you stand on a soapbox and let people know? We feel we should stand on a stage and let them know."

"If you've got a microphone you've got to use it."

Ferry contemplates salvation

LIFE OF BRYAN

YOU'D never guess it from outside reports, but Bryan Ferry is being very active. The "official" publicity story denies all knowledge of current Ferry/Roxy activity, but this is just a smokescreen. The fact is that Roxy Music once again are together and have already recorded all the backing tracks for their next album though Ferry lyrics are still to come.

This means little has changed in the way Roxy — and Ferry, in particular — go about their recording duties, the latter half-biting it up until deadline time before the muse sets his creative instincts into acceleration.

What has changed is that Dave Skinner, the keyboards player on the "Manifesto" tour and a presumably bona fide Roxy doxy, has flit the coop.

Gary Tibbs, the other new Roxy recruit, is currently working in a film, a vocational detour that has caused Roxy 'media consultant' (their term, not mine) Simon Puxley to take his place on several European TV shows where 'Angel Eyes' is selling very well indeed, thank you. Tibbs is still in the band, however, and has turned up to all recording sessions whilst Ferry himself has taken over from the departed Skinner on keyboards.

Ferry seems, despite this bout of activity, to be in the throes of some deep melancholy. Never exactly an extrovert "wild-man-of-rock" type, his manner has grown increasingly retiring of late.

With no new love in his life to replace wife-to-be, as she was, Jerry Hall before her taking up with Mick Jagger, Ferry commutes from his home in Surrey to a flat in the Chelsea area, spending time with his few close friends.

On one such visit last Wednesday the Roxy majordomo actually played some tapes from the projected "next album", including a few stray items — principally a remarkably haunting piece reminiscent of 'Chance Meeting' which may or may not end up on the 'Manifesto' sequel.

After some discourse Ferry decided to grant his world-weary self a breather and slip into the arms of Morpheus. (Ferry went to bed: Ed.)

But if what I heard in albeit half-completed form is anything to go by, the next Roxy album will show the kind of power and perception that his best work has always possessed.

The Eighties will find Ferry and the Roxy troops in fine fettle.

Gang Of Four

Mindless Violence

SEVERAL dates of The Gang Of Four's current British tour had to be cancelled last week after guitarist Andy Gill and singer Jon King were injured in a scuffle at a Leeds nightclub.

The band, with a small group of friends, were dancing at The Stairway Club when three youths approached Gill, claimed that he'd jostled them and said they'd be waiting for him outside. Gill tried to apologise and cool things down but when he later left the club he was attacked by the youths who chased him into the carpark and punched him about the head. King, who went to his assistance, was kicked repeatedly in the face.

One of the youths was arrested the same night and charged with several offences, including Grievous Bodily Harm.

There appears to have been no motive for the attack and it is thought that their assailants did not even know Gill and King were in a rock band. There are also reports that the three youths had been ejected from other nightclubs earlier that evening.

King was badly hurt. His cheekbone was smashed in three places and he was taken to hospital for an immediate operation to restructure the right side of his face.

Jon King, Andy Gill. Pic: Pennie Smith

which had been literally flattened. His sinuses and nerves were damaged and it is not known if he will ever regain any feeling on that side of his face.

Gill suffered the comparatively lesser injury of a broken nose.

Both men were due to take medical advice last Monday, but it seems unlikely that they will be able to recommence the tour for at least another week. The group stress that every attempt will be made to reschedule the cancelled dates in the near future, even though this means that audiences will be treated to the unusual sight of a lead guitarist with his nose in plaster and a singer wearing protective headgear.

Poison Girls

Right Wing Violence

RIGHT-WING violence erupted again last week when a group of National Front skinheads broke up a benefit gig which Poison Girls and Rubella Ballet were playing for The Theatre Royal, Stratford, a community theatre.

According to Poison Girl guitarist Richard Famous, the skinheads appeared to be acting under instructions from a group of older men and had been causing trouble throughout the evening. The flashpoint came when Poison Girls began their 'Bremen Song', which is about the slaughter of Jews in Nazi Germany.

The skinheads invaded the stage, attacked the band and overturned the PA. In the ensuing melee, over £1000's worth of damage was done to the theatre. One member of Rubella Ballet was later taken to hospital for treatment.

Security, which had been organised by The Theatre Royal itself, was minimal because no-one had been expecting trouble at a 'non-political' benefit at a rather inaccessible venue. In those circumstances, said Famous, there was no way the situation could have been contained.

Famous said that there had been an NF march in the afternoon and speculated that many members had stayed on for the gig in the hope of a confrontation with the SWP or ANL. He thought they were particularly incensed by 'Bremen Song' as the NF is currently engaged in a campaign to suppress the facts about Jewish persecution under the Third Reich.

Poison Girls, despite their radical politics, have a number of NF and BM followers and have been heavily criticised by Left-wing groups for refusing to exclude these people from their gigs. The band said they would now have to reconsider their position and later issued a lengthy press statement which blamed trouble at gigs on male violence and power games.

The statement concluded: "OK we are vulnerable to hooligans. OK we need support. Can the Left offer us support which is an alternative to patriarchal authoritarian tactics? Because unless they can, they are failing in the wind. If our brothers in the Male-Dominated-Left could dare to withdraw support from the big Pa instead of trying to emulate him, we could yet be part of a true revolution. How about it, brothers?"

Thrills would be interested in hearing suggestions as to how to ensure personal safety at gigs without the presence of heavy mecho bouncers. Rock Against Sexism, for example, have talked of using women self-defence experts as stewards. Er... how about it, punters?

The Jam

Bouncer violence

THE SECRET Jam gig at The Marquee last Friday became soured before it had even begun with fracas between bouncers and skinheads, which each group, blamed the other for starting.

Immediately after the gig all hell broke loose as a gang of skinheads, apparently consisting of some already gathered outside and others rallied from the nearby Leicester Square Notre Dame Hall, stormed and demolished The Marquee's glass front doors armed with planks, bricks and bits of rubble.

The police arrived five minutes later, and arrested a few fringe spectators with short hair, who as far as I could see, had not been involved in the main bombardment, the protagonists having long since legged it at the first sound of a siren.

It would seem the trouble had started because skinheads were banned from the gig, although eight or ten were allowed in as they were on the guest list.

According to The Marquee, however, these few would not move away from the main doors, and when asked to step inside allegedly leapt upon one bouncer and beat him up, "smashing his nose in and generally knocking him about", at which point the police arrested four of "the offenders".

According to some skinheads outside the club, however, the attack later on in the evening was retribution for the bouncers beating up the skinheads, and then having the skins arrested for it. "They didn't want any skinheads in there in the first place," one said.

Marquee management admitted that the trouble may have initiated because certain people were banned, but maintain that this was a necessary move to prevent trouble inside the club. Their policy is, they state, "to ban anyone who looks like a trouble-maker."

For this reason some punks were banned from The Pretenders gig the week before, because, according to The Marquee, The Pretenders were not a punk band, and therefore punks were only out for trouble.

Likewise The Jam are not a skinhead band and therefore skinheads were only out for trouble.

Wavis gets his girl!

THE GODDESS of the small screen (© Daily Mail) finally met her No. 1 fan last week. World famous recording star Wavis O'Shaye, creator of the Sidney James tribute 'Sid Is Dead', happened to be loitering near the ITN studios on Halloween night (You call waiting outside for three hours because the security guys wouldn't let him into reception 'loitering'? — Ed.) armed only with his false nose, flg rolls and an advance copy of his Anti Pop Records album 'Anna Ford's Bum', when who should emerge after a heavy session with Reggie on News At Ten, but the nation's most vivacious auto-cue reader herself, the aforedeified Ms Ford.

"Why, Wavis!" she cried, sighting the celebrated proboscis of the self-styled South Shields Gangster Of Love. "I've been literally dying to meet you ever since I read about you in Thrills last month. Take me with you to South Shields, away from all this grime and squalor and the Daily Mail! Wavis —" (now cut that out and give us the truth — Ed.)

Oh, all right. Seems Wavis and his wily manager Arthur 2 Stroke cornered the lovely Anna in the ITN car park, where she willingly agreed to get her snook snapped for posterity (unlike Kenny Everett, who got pounced on by the Anti Pop mafia and ignominiously fled, trailing his madcap credibility behind him). Wavis took the opportunity to propose — to Anna, who d'ya think? — but Anna would only commit herself to the comment "to change from Miss Ford to Mrs O'Shaye would be a big step."

Wavis stated later that he had tried to kiss Ms Ford but his nose kept getting in the way. The course of true love never runs smooth. This is Jon Snow, News At Ten, ITN car park.

DANGEROUS VISIONS

WHAT IS this obsession that all historical serials have with childbirth? Why is it so absolutely de rigueur for our heroine to give birth in such a long, hysterical and intricately recorded frenzy?

Last Friday Penmaric (by Polder out of A Horseman Riding By) faithfully followed the well-trodden path with local-girl-made-good Jenna effin' and blindin' away as the long awaited first-born made its entry into the world.

I have no principled objections, you understand, to childbirth being shown but since A Horseman Riding By's tour de force on the subject with hysterical heroine, thunderstorm outside, drunken doctor supervising and murdering maniac wandering the outside fields, with a well-bloodied sickle everything else seems somewhat tame. Still, Penmaric did excel in one field with our heroine dropping no fewer than four sprogs in one instalment and losing two of them. (Surely a record, this.)

Mind you, as up-market soap operas go, The Camerons could run it pretty close in this department with progeny appearing at breath-taking speed throughout the earlier instalments. The Camerons can only be called up-market in that it was on BBC 2 and lasted for more than half an hour at a time. Apart from that it was a pitifully, often hilariously, inept attempt to follow When The Boat Comes In, with the Fife mining village of Pitmungoe simply teeming with wild-eyed socialists, strong, silent miners and people with missing limbs but without Scottish accents.

In a mining saga one has come to accept uncomplainingly the odd crippled father or two but with so few of the cast left sound in wind and limb by the end this owed more to Monty Python than When The Boat Comes In. Those who haven't seen The Camerons have my sympathy for it has now finished and only a brainstorm in BBC Control could guarantee its return.

The Beeb is, of course, prone to such brainstorms. Why else would they allow bozos like Harold Wilson and Tim Rice to host a show like Friday Night... Saturday Morning? In comparison to Wilson, Rice was a natural but it was elderly ex-Beatles producer George Martin who stole the show. George never liked punk music — all three chord tricks and a lot of shouting, he told us — but when Rice asked the pertinent question — was George getting old — George was vehement in his denials. Bending over backwards to be fair, George ventured that some good things had come out of punk, like The Police(!?). Anyone knowing of any band less related to punk than The Police forward their answers to old George.

After a moderately successful start, Friday Night... now lays on as many levels as ITV's Saturday Night People succeeds. Russell Harty, Janet Street-Porter and Clive James are certainly not everyone's cup of tea, but at least they are relaxed, informative and sharp, in that order.

Where James fell down though was in his analysis of John Pilger's hour long special on Cambodia, shown earlier in the week. When Pilger, arguably Britain's finest journalist, puts together some of his greatest work, it is hideously depressing to see intelligent people moved not to anger or to praise but only to carping criticism of Pilger's

'soft' approach to the Vietnamese. Pilger has not tried to suggest Vietnam is perfect, he has simply given credit where it's due to redress the balance of the media's anti-Vietnamese stance. The very basic point is that had the Vietnamese not 'invaded' Cambodia the Pol Pot regime would still be in power and even the inadequate aid now arriving there would not be arriving at all. No doubt if the Americans had done the same thing they'd have been 'liberators'.

And now for Something Else. A programme made by teenagers is an admirable idea which has unfortunately turned out to be dull, worthy and a little embarrassing.

When a whole stream of participants tell me they have nothing to do and no money I do not doubt it for a second. I do doubt that it makes for interesting television.

Still, one joyful moment came with one Greg Van Dyke, a singer who would probably rather be called a composer. If you thought Gary Numan was just a Bowie impersonator, Greg takes things a stage further. He's a Numan impersonator.

Appropriately enough he did a number called 'Clone'. If I was being charitable, I'd say it was all a clever piss-take... if I was being charitable.

And finally, a must for all late '60s freaks is Quatermass which seems to consist of spaced-out hippies congregating in fields and raising their hands to the sky. (Ah, those were the days!) and John Mills being a bit too convincing about not knowing what's going on. He's not as young as he was. Presumably, civilisation as we know it is in peril. C'mon now, what harm can a bunch of spaced-out old hippies do?

Brixton: If you want trouble, ask a policeman

AT ABOUT 3.15 on the afternoon of Wednesday, October 17th, about twelve policemen, some uniformed and some in plain clothes, rushed the derelict house on the corner of Dexter Road and Raiton Road in Brixton, on which the Raiton Housing Association was working.

The Raiton Housing Association was begun by two members of the Raiton Youth Club, Vivian Weathers (as in Island Recording Artist Vivian Weathers... J and Donald Lewis, with the intention of providing employment and training opportunities for unemployed youth club members. With the wages of the workers paid by the Government's Inner City Partnership scheme the Housing Association renovates old houses.

The Brixton police force's ill treatment of the area's black community has long been notorious. Always able to fall back on the iniquitous "Sus" law their operations frequently take on the air of para-military operations. Periodically parts of the district are closed off because of "bomb scares" that appear to be thinly disguised excuses to permit the force to go on manoeuvres replete with helicopter back-up assistance.

The police behaviour on October 17th was no better and no worse than usual. With one Sergeant 64L in charge they subjected the Housing Association workers to their standard methods of intimidation: they were pushed around, abused, made to take clothes off and were searched. Why? Well, of course, no-one knows.

Indeed, when two youth club Action Committee members, Winston Curniffe and Linton Johnson, realised what was going on and went to find out about it they were subjected to the same treatment.

This incident is described in the first edition of Action Line, the witty, hard and professional newly instigated monthly newsletter of the Raiton Youth Club Action Committee. Much of the writing contained within it suggests that it comes from the fluid typewriter of the club's best-known member, Linton Johnson.

Under the headline of "A Di Membahs A Carry Di Swing" a potted history of the Youth Club is offered, describing the twelve week sit-in that resulted from the Methodist Church Authorities' attempt to close the club right up to the reinstatement last month of Ivan Madray, the senior youth worker who was suspended by the Inner London Education Authority following the sit-in.

The sit-in was a total success. As the newsletter's final line concludes, "Action Line say forward to a stronger and better club. Forward to members and parent power."

Linton Kwesi Johnson: Youth Club Leader extraordinaire. Pic: Pennie Smith.

Tyger Records: Youth Clubs Can Be Fun

OTHER Youth Clubs apart from Raiton Road appear to be doing their best to dispel the popular image of them as avuncular, rather self-righteous institutions.

Why, over in Uxbridge, just to the west of the capital city, the London Borough of Hillingdon even has a Youth Club-run Small Label.

Tyger Records, which owes its existence largely to the energetic attentions of Youth and Community Social Workers Lorraine Morgan and Peter Kent, has now put out four 45's since I Jag And The Tracksuits' first single, 'Red Box.'

Distributed by the able Spartan network (see below) the discs have all so far sold out the 2,000 pressing they've each cut. With the exception of their second release, Leeds band Agony Column's 'I Had It All Worked Out', all of the musicians — the other two acts have been The Rhythm Cats and The Statistics — have had connections with the Youth Club.

All the way along Tyger has been self-financed. Hillingdon Council, a Tory council these days who apparently have vague visions of the label fitting into the Wonderful Boadicea's concept of Self-help, have given murmurs of encouragement but no money. The cash has come instead from the regular Friday night gigs that the Club holds and as a result of which Lorraine Morgan and Peter Kent have now been able to afford, at a total cost of about £3,000, to instal both a rehearsal and a four-track recording studio.

A full-time engineer is shortly to be employed to operate the studio equipment and when this has happened the studio will operate on a commercial basis, being rented out to whoever wishes to pay its modest three or four pounds an hour.

In addition, the club serves as a meeting place to bring together all of the rock musicians in the Uxbridge area. Every Tuesday night there is a "Feedback" evening at which films are shown, instrument clinics are operated, and people are taught how to operate studio equipment.

Tyger began because Peter Kent was appalled at the way in which it seems impossible for new bands to break through.

"At least after they'd played at our club they could mention that and it might help a little," he says, "and the same thing applies to the label. It is so difficult to get big labels interested in you. I've seen how bands have tried to get A & R men to come down to our gigs and they never turn up."

A Spartan Existence

ALTHOUGH the coroner's report is not yet in, the demise of Radar Records comes as a timely reminder of how few genuinely independent record companies there are.

Without pushing a simple-minded big-equals-bad line, it would seem to the starg-eyed outsider that if such links with mammon could be avoided, it would be A Good Thing.

Having seen how independent distribution appealed to the rash of emergent little labels Tom McDonald and Dave Thomas, two hard-headed industry insiders, founded Spartan Records in mid-1978 and claim they have never approached a major company or label. Surely, I asked Tom McDonald, some initial touting was necessary?

"No... to a degree it was a street buzz. We did 2,000 of the first single and it carried on from there."

He doesn't think there is a firm comparable to Spartan and the facts bear him out. They handle independents exclusively and are the only nationwide concern to eschew such sidelines as imports, deletions and cut-outs.

They have about 2,500 accounts, all with access to a catalogue drawing on some 100 labels and 80 companies. Handling a large booming independent is ruled out, however, as the smaller fry would suffer.

Rough Trade are considered manageable and Charly were welcomed when they ditched Pye in Spartan's favour. What's more, their claims to speedy, efficient service are supported by Richard Scott of Rough Trade, who need Spartan to reach beyond their regular circuit.

"Spartan get involved when something takes off, like Strife Little Fingers album. When Chrysalis picked up The Specials' single, it was a race between Phonodisc, Spartan and us to get the record in the shops. Spartan won easily."

Look, Spartan are no charity, nor are they the only ones to handle independents, but they'll get your record places beyond the reach of the best-run small-scale operation, without the usually inevitable strings. That should give all you embryo skiffers pause for thought — at the very least — before you resign yourselves to signing for the cameras amid the potted plants and chilled white wine.

RAR—conference

AFTER seemingly trying every building that the Polytechnic of Central London possesses, your intrepid reporter finally tracked down the RAR Remix Conference Nov '79 to a small lecture theatre in PCL's Cavendish St. lump of concrete.

Upon arrival discussion on RAR's Dance and Defend gigs, in support of the Southall, Leicester and West Bromwich Defence Funds, had begun, though many of the delegates had apparently left their brains cosily wrapped up in bed. Delegates from Manchester, Bradford, Tyneside, Wales and other distant points had risen at the ungodly hour of 6 am to get there.

It showed, with pre-lunch discussion on RAR records (from Stevenage, Tyneside, Glasgow, all reportedly selling well); a RAR compilation LP (with Gang of 4, Mekons, Mistry, Ruts, Aswad, Elvis Costello, Steel Pulse (7), and others. Expected Feb '80.); and a very professional looking RAR band contract (to be used at future gigs) all meeting murmurs of approval.

Further pre-lunch discussions covered the BM threat, with RAR Central able to report some success at persuading commercial venues to take measures to prevent Tufly violence, and greater co-ordination at London RAR gigs.

The effects of a liquid lunch were soon apparent in the afternoon session, with 3½ hours of lively debate. Temporary Hoarding, RAR's bi-monthly (quarterly, annual?) paper came in for some heavy salvos. Too much politics, not enough music, with one lady from Manchester taking great exception to the latest cover, and many complaints that when it did come out everything in it was out of date. But the detractors were suitably subdued when made aware of the problems facing TH editorial. No nice office, no money and not enough workers.

The conference wound to a close with a motion of strongest support for the Campaign Against the Immigration laws (Demonstration on Nov 25th). RAR hopes to provide music all the way for a planned march to London by Bradford Asian youth (that'll be a long gig). And all those Rock Against Thatcher badges you've been seeing since the iron housewife took office aren't just a Bettabadges rip-off, but advance publicity for a planned mass demo and open-air gig next spring Bank Holiday.

RAR's first quarterly Remix conference finished, leaving the impression that RAR is no longer a Mickey Mouse organisation hobbling around in one of the most cut-throat industries in the West. They're here to stay and they mean it, man. And woman.

Stairway To Heaven

BIZARRE happenings still plague Led Zeppelin.

Philip Churchill Hale, a 22-year-old photographer, was found dead in one of the beds at Jimmy Page's country home at Plumpton Place in Sussex the week before last. Hale, who graduated from the Royal College of Art with a photography degree this year, ran his own photographic business in nearby Plumpton.

Jimmy Page, who also owns occultist Aleister Crowley's former home on the shores of Loch Ness, and others present at Plumpton Place were interviewed by police after the body was discovered last Wednesday.

There were no signs of violence on Hale's body and foul play has been ruled out.

Hale, an only child, lived with his parents in Ditchling in Sussex. According to his mother, Mrs Penelope Hale,

"My son and Jimmy were great friends. They met some years ago when we were neighbours. Jimmy is shattered by Philip's death."

After examining a pathologist's report the Sussex coroner ordered that an inquest should be held on Hale. It will take place in Hove on November 28.

Feat Don't Fail Us Now

FURTHER to last week's Thrills tale of the expected release this week of 'Down On The Farm', the final Little Feat album, we have received the appalling news that the LP's release date has now been shelved indefinitely due to a decision to re-mix the record so that George's guitar parts are less prominent.

Though these are all the available details of this strange and heretical act Thrills has managed to come by the Neon Park-designed cover of the record.

Specials Comp Results

Sensible replies to sensible questions win sensible Warrington lass Specials Night-Out for her and three of her friends. 16-year old Deana Emson was one of many who supplied the correct answers to our Special Two-Tone competition (Oct 20, '79).

However, when it came to the all-important tie-breaker it was Deana who came out on top. She and the three friends of her choice will be guests of The Specials and Two Tone/Chrysalis when the tour that's shakin' the nation to the foundation skanks into Liverpool on November 21, when they will be showered with Specials albums and promo booty. Here are the correct answers to the six questions posed: (1) Two Tone is a clothing material (2) Fred Perry is a sportsman. (3) Dandy Livingstone waxed the original version of 'Message To You Rudy' (4) Likewise, 'Monkey Man' was an old Toots & The Maytals high-stepper. (5) 'Gangsters' was produced by The Specials themselves. (6) 'Do The Dog' was one of Georgie Fame's show-stoppers. The 21 runners-up who each score the inevitable poke in the eye with a Crackerjack pencil and a copy of The Specials' debut Two Tone album are, left to right: 'Naughty' Jonny Price, Leeds 6; Carol Sloman, Paddington, London W.2.; Robert Hurst, Bulwell, Nottingham; Terry Dempster, Streatham, London S.W.16; Mark Adams, Kenon, Harrow; Robert Hollier, Oxford; Bridget Clay, Bethnal Green, London E.2; Craig Lilly, Claverdon, Warwick; Simon Murphy, Cardiff, South Wales; P.L.G. Way, Portsmouth; George McKay, Norwich; Richard Bull, Easley, Reading; Cathrine Booth, London W.2; Russ Beeching, Nottingham; Rob Bishop, Solihull; Nick Appleton, Whitstable, Kent; Alan Hussey, Woolton, Liverpool; Andrew Southworth, Aigburth, Liverpool; Alan Burgess, South Ascot, Berks; Gary Price-Hunt, Halesowen, West Midlands; R. Hodgins, Glasgow, Scotland.

THE NEW PORTABLE SOUND STUDIO

This Philips N2233 automatic recorder looks simple enough.

Simple to operate yes, but there's a lot more to the Philips N2233 than its smart looks let on.

It's much more like a portable sound studio.

Of course it records cassettes like ordinary recorders. And the quality is a lot more than you'd expect from something so small.

The Philips N2233 has a cue and revue capability too.

This enables you to put together your own selection of music. It also lets you play back material the moment you have recorded it. Watch out Kid Jensen!

You'll agree that such a sophisticated piece of equipment as the Philips N2233 shouldn't be called simply a cassette recorder.

The portable sound studio is much more flattering.

Front Filth

LAST WEEK Martin Webster, national activities organiser of the National Front, was found guilty on two charges of inciting racial hatred through articles in the National Front News.

Though sentenced to six months in prison on each charge the sentences were suspended for two years by Judge Arthur Figgis who told Webster "I do not want to make a martyr of you". Webster was also fined £150 and ordered to pay costs up to £530.

The articles in the National Front News, most of which were written by Webster himself, listed crimes committed by coloured immigrants and said that coloured people were corrupt and violent, indulged in bizarre rites and carried tuberculosis and typhoid.

When, after the jury had returned its unanimous verdict, Webster's defending counsel rose to speak before sentence was passed Judge Figgis remarked: "This is the first time that I have known counsel to rise to plead mitigation for a client who has himself advocated in the witness box tougher penalties for criminals."

Webster is to pay his fine and costs at the rate of £10 a week.

I'm Maharishi... Fly Me!

UNHOLY squabbling is breaking out on the astral plane.

There is a large amount of disharmony and a lack of cosmic unity round at The Guru-Of-The-Month Club.

Chaps are cross with the claims of other chaps. Famous late sixties' rock star the Maharishi Mahesh Yoga (World President of Transcendental Meditation Industries, Inc.) was unhappy when a writ for £500,000 was slapped on him by fellow Doctor Of The Soul Swami Vishnu Devanandax for falsely advertising that he could teach people to fly.

The Swami claimed that India's ancient religions were being brought into disrepute by the Maharishi's Babylonian actions. The Big Mash ignored the Swami's writ, however. Eventually, after the Swami had spent £20,000 in legal fees, he dropped his lawsuit.

Instead, the Swami is now offering £5,000 to anyone who will demonstrate levitation under laboratory conditions. He totally disputes the claims of the TM'ers. "All the photos," he says, "you see of people hovering in the air are fakes. If he can teach people to fly, he must prove it."

Levitators should land at the Swami's headquarters at 33 Albany Street, Regents Park, London.

Decca-ying

THE WEEK following the announcement of EMI's astonishing lack of profits in their last financial year EMI Records Managing Director Ramon Lopez was asked by Thrills whether he expected other major record companies to be shortly as troubled as his own.

Yes, he replied. EMI were the largest company and therefore it was inevitable that they would be the first to be hit. Equally inevitably, he said, other companies would shortly be equally stricken.

It should come as no surprise then that Decca Records, for long considered with derisive contempt by certain sections of the music business, is being sold off by its parent company, who appear more successful in making profits from the manufacture of missiles than from selling records.

The majority of Decca's recording and publishing interests have been picked up by the US Polygram concern which operates in this country through Polydor and Phonogram. These interests include, presumably, the entire output of the Rolling Stones during the band's days with the label plus a wealth of sixties classic soul and rock.

In its last financial year Decca Records lost £1,600,000.

More of this sort of thing, please.

COME ON OUT AND DO THE SEXUAL DANCE

The Au Pairs talk about faking orgasms. Graham Lock takes notes

IN THE DARKENED hall, everyone is frantically dancing. A hard, lashing new wave music fills the air; a joyous, abrasive noise that staunchly evinces the visceral rush of great rock 'n' roll. 'Kerb Crawler' shudders to a halt and, onstage, The Au Pairs slip quickly into their next number.

Lesley Woods strums a chord, eyes up the audience and announces: "This one is about faking orgasms". Then they're slamming out another compulsively danceable group original. The Au Pairs, you understand, are determined that people will enjoy their gigs on the basic toe-tapping, hip-shaking level even while their lyrics take issue with the more problematic aspects of sexual politics.

They all agree on this; as they do with Woods' opinion that 'Come Again' — the song in question — is the most important in their repertoire.

"I think it's important because no one has written a song like it before," she explains. "It's like, you know all this stuff you get in Cosmopolitan about how women ought to have orgasms, and the song's about this guy thinking he's got to give her an orgasm and she knows he's thinking that, so there's a lot of pressure on them both and she ends up faking it."

Martin Culverwell, the group's friend-cum-manager, chips in: "In the early '70s you had a recognition of female sexuality which you hadn't had before — that women had orgasms, especially — and 'Come Again' is about the way in which that's been re-taken, redefined, in male terms, so that giving a woman an orgasm has become a new standard for male performance in sex. And then it's no longer female sexuality; and the pressure is on the woman to please the man by faking it."

Paul Foad who, with Woods, handles the group's guitars and vocals, adds that the song is quite demoralising for both sexes. "I mean, where do you go from there? But then, it's a place that people do get into."

Drummer Pete Hammond brings the discussion back to basics. "It's heavy in some ways," he says, but it's also the most danceable song we've got."

THE AU PAIRS — Woods, Foad, Hammond and bassist Jane Munroe — have been together for nearly a year. They live in Birmingham which, except for Woods who hails from Staveley, is where they were born. Their three-track single, comprising 'You', 'Kerb Crawler' and 'Domestic Departure', was released on B21 Records a few months ago. A spikey, attractive debut, it doesn't quite convey the sheer boppy ferocity of their live act but was good enough to win them a John Peel session and offers of London gigs. It was on their latest visit to the capital, to play two Rock Against Sexism gigs prior to joining the Gang Of Four tour, that I took the chance to talk to them.

In contrast to their forceful stage presence, the group are softly-spoken and often hesitant in expressing themselves. Nonetheless, The Au Pairs have a firm grasp of what they're about. Foad: "I'd say the group was about sexual politics in a broad way. And that's something I've only started thinking about in the last two years, through meeting people who've made me aware of the stereotypical roles society puts on people."

"Pete and I used to be in the same band just after we left school and it was very typical hard-rock all-lads-together thing. I mean, I didn't take women musicians seriously at all. But then I met Lesley, and new wave was starting, and RAR, and I began to see that music was an important way of getting across to people."

Woods: "I think what we do is put across issues on quite a simple level. We make it very accessible, not heavy or difficult. We're just making the point that people are stereotyped and showing how that affects men and women, but also showing how it affects them differently."

Au Pair songs do achieve this simple incisiveness. 'Kerb Crawler', 'Ideal Woman' and 'Monogamy (Oh, What You Do To Me)' are self-explanatory; 'You' is about police harassment of prostitutes; 'Jenny And Her Boyfriend Jim' about the pressures on a teenage boy to assert his 'manhood' by screwing his girlfriend and the pressures on her to comply.

Woods: "I mean, there's not just one area. We don't pick on one big issue. We're picking on lots of small things that come out of everybody's everyday experience."

Hammond: "A lot of people probably haven't got a clue what we're singing about cos they can't hear the lyrics; they just like the music cos we make it easy to dance to. And you just hope that it eventually gets across. I think that's all you can hope for, that people will think about what you're trying to say."

It's because of this limitation that The Au Pairs place a great emphasis on their stage presentation.

Woods: "It was important from the beginning that there were two women in the group. For me, anyway."

Foad: "Lesley said she wanted another woman and we agreed because one of the things the band wanted to do was break down the way the music media treat women in bands."

Hammond: "Yeah, and the way most women in bands turn themselves into sex objects and all the guys at the front are shouting 'get 'em off' or 'show us yer tits' and that crap. We haven't had that because Lesley and Jane don't portray themselves like that. They take a more aggressive stance."

This is less true of Munroe, who simply stands at the back playing bass, than of Wood's tough, sardonic and utterly confident fronting of the band. I ask if this is a role she's deliberately adopted.

"No, I don't think I force myself into being like that. Do you mean being strong or being aggressive? It depends, I suppose. If there's a load of skinheads shouting 'where's yer bra?' then, yeah, I get aggressive. But I don't think we're heavy onstage. We make a conscious effort to be accessible, to inject humour."

The Au Pairs don't need to worry; they're the most exciting, provocative new band I've seen for months. And their songs have an urgent intelligence, a mature sympathy with the hassles of ordinary life, that are only too rare in the rock biz.

Like Hammond says, quoting Bob Last's catch phrase, "it's sort of serious fun".

Reasons to be Cheerful [part 4]

If you want to buy Hi-Fi that really does justice to your record collection there have probably been a couple of things holding you back.

You don't have thousands of pounds to spend, and the money you can afford will only buy a pretty mediocre system.

That was last year.

Now Sansui have developed a new range of receivers, amplifiers, tuners, cassette decks and turntables that makes a complete nonsense of the you-only-get-what-you-pay-for syndrome.

LEDs, VU meters, high/low filters, Dolby – all the features you'd expect from the very best Hi-Fi at a price you certainly wouldn't.

You can buy a complete 45W per channel system (including speakers) from only £360.

If that doesn't cheer you up, nothing will.

Just send off the coupon for more information and full specifications.

There's More Than One Way To Skin A Cat

◆ SINGLES OF THE WEEK

THE PRETENDERS: Brass In Pocket (Real). Despite the success of 'Stop Your Sobbing' and 'Kid', your present writer has kept The Pretenders in his 'pending' file. 'Brass In Pocket' moves them straight into the 'in' tray and — all else being equal — will give Chrissie and her cohorts that major convincing hit. It's the best kind of derivative, egocentric rock single: it insists 'I'm special, give me your attention' in a plangent, pleading manner, provides enough rhythmic poke to qualify as a dance record while still remaining smooth enough for continuous application, it blends '60s guitar and '70s drums with an exquisite kitten of a melody... it's your basic nice record for middlebrows.

Sure The Pretenders are stewing up leftovers, but they've got their hands on Grade A ingredients and — to push the metaphor a little further — they've got a good recipe. 'Brass In Pocket' also gains points because of the effectiveness with which it demonstrates that a record can positively bristle with hooks without getting all cluttered up with superfluous cattle waste products. Not a record to kill for, but one to inspire great fondness.

SNAKEFINGER: Kill The Great Raven (Virgin). Actually, this record is dreadful. I've only made it a single of the week because I'm a spineless elitist. MALFUNCTION! I'm sorry. Where were we? In fact, 'Kill The Great Raven' is the funniest record of the current seven-day period, a late-night collision between Gary Glitter, dub and heavy metal with hippie joke lyrics. Snakefinger is — of course — pleasant old hippie Phil Lithman and The Residents are involved and you will probably never hear it anywhere except on the Peel show and will therefore never have the faintest idea of what I'm talking about. To be honest with you, I haven't the faintest idea of what I'm talking about. Next!

ERROLL DUNKLEY: A Little Way Different (Arawak). Rule Number One: anyone who's just had a hit is therefore in a position to have another one. If we're lucky it'll be with a better record, if not, with a worse one. Erroll Dunkley just got four lemons in a row with 'OK Fred' and therefore one would desire a speedy repetition of this feat with 'A Little Way Different', which is a much better record. A powerful hypnotic administered by Dennis Bovell (who also gets his name on another totally soppy Marie Pierre single this week), it gently but forcefully makes the point that a pluralistic society is the only functional way for human beings to coexist, sounds vast and spacious and edges casually into dub (at the end of the 12-inch). There's some lovely mouth-harp on the Version (izzat you, Julio?).

◆ REISSUES OF THE WEEK
JAMES BROWN: Papa's Got A Brand New Bag (Polydor). Three agile, raucous slices of Proper Soul Music ('I Got You (I Feel Good)' and 'Out Of Sight' 'drop up on the B-side) packaged with exquisite visual taste and a Cliff White sleeve-note... can we have a rousing chorus of "Is this excellent value for money or what?" please? Chorus: "Is this exquisite value for money or what?"

Thank you! It also provides great pleasure to be able to note that all three tracks appear to have been remastered with great care by the engineers responsible so that the tracks just leap out of the grooves. On Polydor's '30 Great Hits/21 Golden Years' double, you have to mess with your amp to get the tracks sounding right on account of they're all compressed to fit them in, but on this single it sounds just like singles ought to. Get hip to this: it'd be a shame if the clientele was limited to the more academically oriented junior moddyboys and oldsters wanting to save wear and tear on their original copies.

PETER TOSH: Stepping Razor/Legalise It (Virgin). All the Peter Tosh tracks I need on one handy portable 7" single released to coincide with the motion picture Rockers in which both these tracks are featured. One paean to the joys of being a hard man with a short temper (marred only by some incongruous rock lead guitar) and an ode to the pleasures of consuming vast hard to sound important, this new song (yes, more songs about death and women) doesn't sound like a Number One, and — if it was by an unknown act — not even particularly like a hit. It has some crisp drumming, serious rhythm guitar and snappy lead/backing vocal playoffs, but it's drowned in syrupy strings and far too many keyboard overdubs. Overall, not an auspicious start to the second side of the Rats' Greatest Hits album. Wrong string, wrong yoyo.

ALEX HARVEY/THE NEW BAND: Shakin' All Over (RCA). This man does not do things the easy way. Alex's murderous attack on The Pirates' signature tune begins night of their lives. The song sounds like something Strummer and Jones would write and then reject. If it actually was The Clash, it would depress me very thoroughly. As it is, one feels fairly neutral about the whole thing.

THE POINTED STICKS: Out Of Luck (Stiff). Foreign chaps who sound like Elvis Costello at 78rpm. In a parallel universe this could have been The Rats' follow up to 'Looking After Number One', on account of the guitars and drums. It's taken fractionally too fast to be coherent, but time flies when you're having fun, and those words that these tired old ears can catch sound moderately amusing. Entertaining.

BARBRA STREISAND/DONNA SUMMER: No More Tears (Enough Is Enough) (CBS). Begins exquisitely over lachrymose piano and rent-an-orchestra with Streisand crooning, "It's raining, it's pouring/My love life is boring/Me to tears" before Summer enters to commiserate with her and then it goes into a disco section where the keyboard player amuses himself by playing the riff from 'Superstition' ridiculously fast. Our two heroines (seen rubbing shoulders on the cover and trying to outpace each other) then hold a lengthy contest to see who can sound alternatively more dynamic and more sensitive. In the '80s, all records will be marketed like this.

THE RUTS: Jah War (Virgin). In which the road to Babylon is paved with good intentions. No doubt sick to the back teeth with being accused of heavy metal tendencies, The Ruts smash back (ehh?) with a single that ends up doing for Linton Kwesi Johnson what

The Police do for Bob Marley. Possibly the most unimaginatively earnest piece of white reggae I've ever heard, it produces an odd sensation in the listener, who taps his foot, approves of the gesture, enjoys the rhythm and the hook... and cringes at the most embarrassing bit of blackface since the Blues Boom. A better gesture than record, it stimulates the hope that — having gotten it out of their system — The Ruts will be able to assimilate and utilise their influences without mimicking them so slavishly.

BERNIE TORME: All Day And All Of The Night (Parole). HM/new wave crossoverite Bernie Torme takes time off from strenuous Stratstrangling duties with Ian Gillan, records awful version of old Kinks classic for obscure indie, defends to no useful avail, makes prat of self, sells small number of records to rabid collectors of records with stark black and white sleeves.

THE LINES: On The Air (Red). Daffy and charming intervention from the neo-psychedelic wing of Modern Chaps United in the shape of The Lines, who emerge from an intriguingly multicoloured mist with the potpourri of stylistic devices on long-term loan from Marc Bolan and Lou Reed. Not nearly as rickety as it sounds, though heavily outclassed by 'Not Through Windows', the first of the two B-sides. To be encouraged.

SHEILA B. DEVOTION: Spacer (Carrere). The latest in the continuing saga of things produced, arranged, composed, guitaried and bassed by Bernard Edwards and Nile Rodgers on behalf of the Chic Organisation. I'm as fond of Chic's records as anybody can be who can't record a disco record unless it's a 12" single in a soft-porn picture sleeve, but this doesn't boast a particularly dynamic riff or a memorable chune, and Sheila B. is such an emotional, expressive singer quantities of pot. This reissue is a ploy calculated to irritate Tosh, EMI and Rolling Stones Records. Let's hope Tosh is too stoned to go round to Virgin and duff 'em all up.

◆ HEADS DOWN, SEE YOU AT THE END
BOOMTOWN RATS: Diamond Smiles (Ensign). Sigh. The Rats are in an invidious position at this precise moment in time, Jim. If 'Diamond Smiles' makes Number One, then they'll be even huger, and if it doesn't everyone'll think they're finished. Speaking as a person who reckons that he likes The Boomtown Rats but finds their new album for the most part cluttered, fussy and trying too with what sounds like Wilko Johnson playing 'Heart Of Glass' through a dying amplifier and then develops into a runaway express train with the distinctive tones of Glasgow's answer to nuclear attack intoning the hallowed lyrics in a suitably disturbed manner. Later on there's a lengthy and vehement exchange of views between guitar and synthesiser and more vigorous roaring from Harvey, who sounds as splendidly ill-tempered as ever. Not for the squeamish.

THE LURKERS: New Guitar In Town (Beggars Banquet). The Lurkers have improved to the point where they now sound like The Clash on the worst that she makes the speaking clock sound like Aretha Franklin. Purely in order to hedge my bets, may I add that I haven't heard the 12" and that Danny Baker thinks it's wonderful. That's W-O-N-D-E-R-F-U-L. Me, I think it's boring. B-O-R-I-N-G.

SLADE: Sign Of The Times (Barn). Mind you, so's this. People are still asking whatever happened to Slade, and — judging by this bewildered Beatley ballad — not a lot has occurred since the last time the question was asked. The saga of Slade should stand as an Awful Warning to successful British bands who are determined to crack the States and keep playing the States until it happens. If it doesn't (as it didn't to Slade), you end up as much of a nonentity in your homeland as you are over there. That's what happened to Slade.

THE TOURS: Tourist Information (Virgin). It is vaguely significant that none of the youthful bands whose primary audible influence is that of Roxy Music have not been enormously successful. This is one of those ones. If Virgin's budget will stretch that far, they should buy The Tours a complete set of Gary Numan records and then we'll see them chasing XTC to the topmost of the poppermost! In the meantime, our staff recommend a rigorous course of cold showers and healthy exercise.

SLAUGHTER AND THE DOGS: You're Ready Now (DJM). Hold everything! Get the bondage pants back from the jumble sale! Punk is not dead! Yes, Slaughter And The Dogs are back on DJM Records, where 'Anarchy' is the watchword, and they've done an absolutely godawful cover of an old Four Seasons song which should cause reflexive pogoing amongst every unemployed towerblock dweller who ever sprayed 'SID IS INNOCENT OK' on the front of his local Woolworths. They can't kill punk because it TRULY SPEAKS FOR THE KIDS! Anarchy! Sid! Subs! Crass! Upstarts! The Clash have sold out! Punk will never letc etc etc). Crappy record.

PHIL DANIELS + THE CROSS: Kill Another Night (RCA). Actor chap joins band, writes songs, sings. The end result is a sort of updated version of the Mike Sarne cheeky-chappie records of the very early '80s (if — as is highly likely — you are too young to twig this reference, count yourself lucky). Chiefly notable for the very excellent pair of red sneakers sported by our hero on the pic sleeve. For populists — and people who can't tell Squeeze, Ian Dury, The Members and The Piranhas apart — only.

THE PURPLE HEARTS: Frustration (Fiction). Allegedly, a mod band: The Purple Hearts have come up with the best piece of beastly-but-dumb teenage whingeing since Eddie And The Hot Rods' epochal 'Teenage Depression' back in '76 or thereabouts (remember Eddie And The Hot Rods? Neither do Island Records). The best line is the one quoted on the cover: "I get Frustration/I wear it like a suit/but the jacket fits too tightly/and there's lead inside my boots." If Mod ever recovers from the crushing blow dealt it by The Merton Parkas' incredibly uninteresting album, The Purple Hearts could still surface before the whole thing goes under.

SUZI HENDRIX: Zero Zero (Radio). If this ludicrously melodramatic parody of Lane Lovich is supposed to be funny, then it's brilliant. If not, then Suze would be better off getting a haircut, changing her name to Elkie Clapton and getting into mod before many people learn to recognise her in the street.

LITTLE WALTER/BILLY BOY ARNOLD: Superharps EP (Red Lightnin'). A festival of honking from a couple of major practitioners. Little Walter was recorded in Chicago shortly before his death, but despite the loud and raucous supporting presences of Bo Diddley and Muddy Waters (gtr). Otis Spann (piano), Clifton James (drums), Jerome Green (maracas) and Buddy Guy (bass), the master sounds well past his prime on recreations of 'Juke' and 'Sad Hours', two of his early blues hits. Billy Boy Arnold was recorded in London two years ago with Tony McPhee on guitar, and puts on a professional if not particularly fiery performance. A well-packaged and revealing piece of blues trivia, and a good footnote to anyone's R&B collection. But is it a single?

"The music business then — whitey owned it. We wuz all used, abused and ripped-off . . ."

The Wilson Pickett interview by Nick Kent

IN GUY PEELAERT'S Rock Dreams tome of some six autumns back, one of the artist's strongest slices of visualised popular music imagery went under the heading of "soul".

The word itself Peelaert portrayed with the simple but sensuous image of a woman's empty rounded buttocks clothed in a tight-fitting satin clip-joint number with two dark-skinned clutches of lithe fingers caressing said rear quarters as in a lascivious couple slow-dancing in some juke-joint.

Likewise, the artist chose to depict most of soul music's classic acts in sleazily debauched environments. OK, so Aretha Franklin was pictured as a gospel singer, while Smokey Robinson was all doe-eyed and the essence of passionate piety, but the rest were drawn right into a backdrop of oily red light sleazorama.

Peelaert's superb portrayal of Wilson Pickett, especially, was spot on. Set in a dimly-lit pool-hall, Pickett's lean physique and snake-eyed demeanour were perfectly captured in the image of the tough sharp-voiced lady-killer glaring in the foreground, pool-cue aggressively in hand. Lean and lithe of frame, his sharp face a mask of taut resilience, his upper lip curled in half-suspicious half-imperious disdain under a natty moustache, Wilson Pickett was the epitome of the male soul vocalist as high-rolling vicarious pimp. Solomon Burke was the lascivious preacher, Joe Tex was the adrenalin-pumping soul raconteur / house-jester, Otis was the lonesome hard-done-by soul brother with the 24-carat larynx and James Brown was the king of 'em all y'all — all pomp, flesh and heavy manner. But Wilson Pickett, with his immaculate mohair two-piece, hair Dixie-pressed to perfection, mean ornery-looking visage and that tough, sensuous mule-kick to his music, was the first and arguably the greatest of the soul men as sharp-shooters — amoral, razor-toting, obsessed with style and a devil with the ladies.

Pickett's style would later be transformed into the garish 'superspade' flesh of Sly Stone and all his late '60s/early '70s surrogate with their pink cadillacs, leopard-skin upholstery and ludicrous displays of endless palm-slapping camaraderie — but just as Pickett was the first, so arguably he was the best.

It's been well over a decade since the halcyon days of Pickett's collaborations, first with Stax and then Atlantic, but the majesty of his string of greatest hits remains gilt-edged, unbeatable. There are certain moments in soul music's repertoire so vibrant, so vivid that words are incapable of doing them justice. To wit: Steve Cropper's guitar hook on Sam and Dave's 'Soul Man'; the sweet acceleration when Cropper's ascending guitar-lines make a head-on collision with the full thrust of the MGs rhythm section and Muscle Shoals horns at the outset of Eddie Floyd's 'Big Bird'; the shuddering strings on Aretha's 'Natural Woman'; the wild-man drum breaks gratis Al Jackson on Otis' 'Shake' . . . Transcendental moments perfectly backed up by the rest of the performance.

One could, of course, choose a similar stunner of a snippet from one of Wilson Pickett's classic repertoire but, truth to tell, Pickett's greatest works aren't the sort of powerhouse product one can zero in on single aspects of. From the first seconds to the last, you're sucked straight into sumptuous four-wheel drive bump'n'grind music, so hot and steamy sensuous that at one time Pickett even looked close to rolling King James Brown off his ostentatious throne.

"Know what I think of when I hear the name James Brown? James Brown, to me, is strictly small-time — and I mean small-time! Just some Georgian kid workin' in some cramped sweaty bar where the stage is so damn small there's only room for him and the drummer. Guitar player's workin' his lips in the bathroom (laughs), sweat drippin' off the walls, hal' Yup, that's how James Brown started and that's how I always think of him."

Good humoured whilst at the same time swamping his raps with a reservoir of libels, condemnations and accusations, Wilson

Pickett — the 1979 model, that is — appears to have lost none of the drive and ferocity that, when mated to the right groove in the right place and the right time, could turn a church full of earnest soul survivors onto all manners of hedonistic god-forsaken activity. For if the likes of 'Don't Fight It', '6345789', and the original untouchable 'Land Of A Thousand Dances' are quintessential dance music aimed at the hips and crotch, then 'In The Midnight Hour' and, particularly, 'Mustang Sally', make for definite crutch music.

Mind you, it's been a fair old while since the 'Wicked' Pickett last hoisted himself into the commercial echelons of the national charts. A long, slow decline saw him ultimately leaving Atlantic in the early '70s and signing up with RCA, under whose banner he went on to create a wretchedly scrappy set of albums. After the RCA snafu, Pickett went on recently to sign up with American EMI (United Artists in this country) and his first UA album 'I Want You' is released here at the beginning of December. Preceded by his new single 'Grooves City' — not a total return to form, but certainly in a different class to his RCA product — the album has Pickett teamed up with producer Andre Perry and arranger Jean Russell, and features seven cuts, diluting the original mighty Pickett bite amidst a sea of lengthy quasi-disco work-outs.

Pickett, true to his candid self, isn't over-enamoured with disco. "It's a wretched, puny form of music but it's the contemporary sound, dig, so I decided to take — uh some of the stronger aspects of the whole sound and jeez' add my own thang to it."

Most telling is the photo of Pickett on the back cover of 'I Want You'. Whereas in his glory days Pickett's style was all dagger-sharp mohair suits and florid purple blouses, now he chooses to dress in some U.S. equivalent of C&A man's casual wear with some nondescript woollen polo-neck covering a torso that, though it's lost its skinny-jimsharpness, is still agreeably trim. (In fact, the photo makes Pickett look like a negroid Roddy McMillan).

IN THE FLESH, Pickett retains the style of 'casual' dress that he showcases on the new album sleeve. A polo-neck is covered by a suit — nothing fancy whatsoever — and although the moustache remains, the Dixie peach has long since been discarded in favour of a conservatively trimmed nappy-headed Afro. The only signs of ostentation are the fingers, which glitter with gold rings encrusted with diamonds. Wilson Pickett circa late '79 is a study in amenability, though his conversation is strafed with bouts of verbal candour that others in his position would never dare pursue.

Noticing the jewellery, I enquire after the extent of Pickett's own material wealth.

"We-e-ell," he remarks, "I can't say I'm hurtin' for money. I've been smart there. Course, that's not to say I couldn't do with some extra dollars."

Money and rip-offs in the music business are subjects close to Pickett's train of thought. Recalling the days when he was lead singer of The Falcons, he remembers that the band's manager, one Robert West, was once hustled by a desperate and impoverished Berry Gordy for a loan with which to press more copies of The Miracles' 'Shop Around'.

"Ha, can you believe that? Berry Gordy was just a two-bit nobody out in Dee-troit and it was that single that kicked off Motown."

Suddenly Pickett is up and steaming, pouring out a massive stream of unprintable accusations against numerous American soul figures. In particular, he fires off at one well-respected white soulman who, he claims bitterly, ripped him off.

"That was the music business then. Whitey owned it, whitey called the shots and we wuz all used, abused and ripped-off by the motherfuckers."

Prior to his solo shots, Pickett as a Falcon had recorded both 'I Found A Love' and 'If You Need Me' amongst others, the latter being covered by The Rolling Stones. Although Pickett has only meagre regard for the group led by "that Jagger schmuck", his one regret regarding cover versions is simply "that The Beatles never done one of my toons. Then I'd be a rich man."

fuckin' album sold eight million") nudges him to continue his railing against "Whitey" 's regime of the business, particularly with regard to Atlantic Records.

"That company, man — they mostly just chewed up black artists and spat 'em out, bankrupt and all messed up. Man, can you believe this? Black performers like myself were allowed two or three days to cut something like twenty cuts, mixes 'n' all, while a band like The Young Rascals were allowed unlimited time — a whole month, two maybe — for their album. See, Atlantic has this image for being real benefactors to black music but hey, there's only four artists who walked out of that company, contract-free with a few dollars in their pocket! That's me, Aretha, Roberta Flack and... uh, man, I forgotten the other one. (Pause). Maybe there wasn't a fourth.

"See, they latched onto all these British rock bands — Led Zepplin, The Rolling Stones and all of them dudes — and they saw dollar signs flyin' everywhere. So, once again, whitey makes all the money, gets all the hand-outs — unlimited studio time, good royalty deals, you name it — and Atlantic just 'bout forgot all about us other cats."

So, Pickett packed his bags and moseyed over to RCA. Unfortunately though the human chemistry that produced gems of the calibre of '6345789', 'Don't Fight It' and 'Mustang Sally', was sadly lacking, as albums such as the awful 'Miss Lena's Boy' readily testify.

Pickett now concurs willingly with the view that the music he made during those years was bad. Things however have changed with the UA deal and he feels 'I Want You' to be... well, not a return to the old thrust of old, but a reasonable compromise.

"Y'see," he states, his words half-assertive, half-tinged with melancholy, "you just can't get that sound no more. It's as simple as that. It's all to do with this new equipment they've got in the studios. It cleans up the sound, makes it real, uh... "Bland? "Yeah, I guess that's the word. 'Cos you sure can't get that old gritty sound, that dirty, raunchy, punchy kind of sound that we got on those old sides."

Asked about the origins of his own particular style, Pickett cites singing gospel in community chapel meetings.

"When I was a young 'un, you'd see these big ole girls just gettin' carried away by it all and hollerin', lettin' it all loose. I used to watch 'em, then I joined in and then I got the sound that I would use as the basis for my whole style of vocalising. I used that wild, abandoned style of singin' and put it into the context of soul."

"Hey, and damn right I'm proud of my old stuff. The groove on those cuts is untouchable and nobody's gonna be able to get close to that ever again. Al Green? Mmmm, he's OK. Sly Stone? He had something but he blew it so bad that I can't have respect for a man like that."

And Wilson Pickett?

"Well, I'm not hurtin' none. You asked me earlier, right, you said, hey Pickett, The Blues Brothers done got a No. 1 album from resurrecting that whole '60s soul sound — that bag you, Sam and Dave, Otis and all originated. So maybe the kids are gettin' tired of disco and want the real thing. But, those guys in The Blues Brothers — they're comedians, man." (John Belushi and Dan Aykroyd are indeed comics whose regular spot on America's Saturday Night Live was a massive reason for The BBs album take-off). "And their album was just vaudeville. It wasn't the real thing and the kids aren't ready for a resurrection of that sound."

"And even if they were, like I said earlier, that sound just couldn't be duplicated. It's a gone dead era and it's down to artists like me to find new directions."

There's a sort of sadness in Pickett's words. Many considered The Blues Bros' success would preface a return to '60s soul taking over from disco. But Sam and Dave are still playing sleazy clubs and Eddie Floyd is stuck on the circular circulation of the cabaret scene.

Pickett reminisces about the boundless camaraderie he shared with Solomon Burke and Otis Redding and how they were all so naive during their halcyon days that "when someone mentioned the word star we'd look up in the sky thinking they wuz talkin' about the cosmos or somethin'."

Suddenly, time is tight. Pickett is a hungry man and he wants to get going to check London restaurants for a decent 'soul food' diner. I ask him how secure he feels currently, particularly in relation to his peers.

"Well, Otis is dead, James Brown is out there, Sam and Dave and Eddie Floyd are scratchin' out a livin on the chittlin circuit... Wilson Pickett? Ah, he ain't doin' too bad!"

He grins broadly, mischievously. The 'wicked' Pickett lives on in the corners of that smile.

Arturo the man with the lead guitar in Pinpoint. The amp is a Vox AC30 Combo. One of them plays through the other and there's no prizes for guessing which Anyway our story starts at the Nashville in October. We decided that as Arturo needed an amp and we had one spare maybe it'd be an idea if the two of them got together. So we pitched up at the Nashville with an AC30 and a couple of Escort rehearsal amps.

Pinpoint were a little bit magic and Arturo said I like the amp and we said keep it and give us some nice things to say about it in an ad and he thought for a bit and then said OK because it's not so bad really which was roughly when we switched on the tape recorder which we left running.

Arturo's amp. A love story.

...the first guitar I ever owned was a Vox Clubman... cost me seven pounds and it had a socket like a television aerial. It was ridiculous really... my brother played in groups years ago... taught me three chords and it just went from there...

What other gear... did I have? All sorts.

A real mish mash... for a long time though I've had my eye on an AC30... preferably an old one although when I've played the new ones there really isn't that much difference...

well they haven't changed it in fifteen years...

No it's the same circuitry...

all that's missing is a few kick marks... no well it'll get like that after a few gigs now I'm using it...

was that the first time you'd set up with it...?

yeah... yeah it was... I was really pleased with the sound... really punchy... I use a Gretsch Roc Jet which is really an old guitar as well and it sounds really good... I think too many people are using the same guitar and amp setup and the sound is too similar in a lot of groups... the thing about an AC30 as well is that it's small... you don't get as much spread so the vocal mike and the drum mike don't pick up as much... the overall sound's not as mushy as it used to be...

how do you find working in the studio? ...

depends on the producer... you can hear every single beat... every single note... the first time you're in a studio is the first time you really hear yourself... there's no way though you can sound as raw in a studio as you do live... no way... *

what's the most frustrating thing about playing live... touring? ... getting to a gig at five and not going on stage 'til midnight... and having to kill time in a town you don't know with no money... most of mine goes on the motorway services... eating sometimes and playing Space Invaders...

when you were doing the tour with the Members did you have any hassles? ... None at all... we had a really great time... I think that the people who you do get like that... they think you don't deserve a soundcheck or whatever... have something seriously wrong with them... it's silly... everyone's a support band sometime...

"WE'LL probably hear them giggling somewhere if we listen," Phil said, holding up his hand abruptly and halting our mad dash around the empty corridors of the London School of Economics.

Phil is the manager of the Dolly Mixtures, a three-piece all girl band from Cambridge, just arrived in London, who are already causing quite a stir amongst avaricious A&R men. It was the Dollys themselves we were rather aimlessly searching for.

"I can't understand it," Phil fretted, "they were right here five minutes ago, I can't think where they've shot off to."

Ten minutes later they passed me in the main hall, giggled and ran off "looking and sounding like three little girls dressed up in high heels and make-up," — or at least that's what I'm supposed to think. They in fact looked more like three girls in their late teens dressed down in cutesy cotton frocks, short skirts and ankle socks.

But that's the cynical heck talking. You, dear readers, may just believe drummer Hester (no surnames — "they're revolting, really.") when she throws up her hands in horror at my opinion and says "Oh no, that's awful, that's absolutely against what we're trying to do, honest, please believe me."

What they are trying to do, they explain, is just be themselves, and not be afraid of admitting that they are girls — yes, female musicians that are neither Tomboys nor sex symbols.

My suggestion that they are merely exploiting their sexuality in another way, by trying to come over as young, sweet, innocent little girlies, prompts an unconvincing outcry

Baaa! Baaa! Baaa!

*1 to r, Below
Rachel

from bassist Debsey: "Honestly, we don't put that on, that's absolutely what we are and what we feel, and, and..." she stutters falteringly over her under-rehearsed lines, "...and this is my favourite dress." She lifts her short polka-dot dress by the hem and pouts, "and I'm going to wear it".

There are helpless sighs and troubled looks all round, and Hester says if that's the sort of image they're putting across they'd better do something about it, but they are nevertheless reluctant to reveal their ages. They tell me, again amid much giggling, that most people think they're about 14. They seem rather deflated when I say they look more like 18 to me — which they are.

"But if we tell people that they think we should be better (musicians) than we are," Hester explains.

So they should.

Their music, which Hester terms 'Dolly Rock', is a crude blend of new mod-angled pop, with an overlay of Ronettes/Marvelettes vocal trill and lyrical style. Titles such as 'He's So Frisky', 'Will He Kiss Me Tonight' and 'Shakerella' illustrating this perfectly.

They all predictably quote '60s Motown as favourite listening and influence, and mention Madness and Secret Affair as present day favourites, along with Squire, to whom they liken their own music.

ON STAGE, they are corny immature and under-rehearsed. Between numbers there are shy thanks, bashful smiles — you almost expect a curtsy — and a pigeon-toed 1234 countdown before they trip clumsily into the next number.

The Dolly Mixtures are right when they say their personal image complements their music. They just want to communicate with their audience, they plead, and be a happy, boppy band.

"But there is a serious side to us", Debsey tells me, interrupting Hester's happy-go-lucky monologue. "We do want to work at improving our music, and think about making records, although we don't intend throwing our souls away for music — because we like them."

She simpers, and I cringe. How long can they keep this up?

The Dolly Mixtures formed in February last year, after Hester and Debsey got a taste of performing, from singing back-up vocals in a band which did one gig and then broke up.

Debsey gestures excitedly, "We were ab - so - lutely chronic, and Hester and I decided we wanted to play our own instruments and have our own band. Rachel's brother, (she's the guitarist and lead vocalist) was in a band, and he taught us basic beats and so on."

Their first gig was in April, and they hadn't done more than a couple of dozen, all in and around Cambridge, when John Peel picked up on them (through a local fanzine (the girls presume) 'phoned them and asked them to play at a roadshow in Norwich. After this they did a session for the John Peel show, "and, er, that was the end of John Peel," Debsey laughs.

They've now played about eight London gigs to date ("They've all been so exciting," Debsey proclaims) — exciting being one of their favourite adjectives. And now, according to Phil, record companies are queuing to sign them up. The Dolly Mixtures, he says, "are like three little lambs staked out and waiting for the vultures to descend."

But the girls want to wait a few months yet, till their name gets around and a suitable deal comes along. They have already been offered a one-off with Beggars Banquet, but would rather sign long term. "We don't want to sell 5000 or something and then, nothing, back to square one," Debsey explains.

Hester says there are lots of things they want to do in the meantime, including finding a good and sympathetic producer to do some demos with.

She is no longer giggling though, her face is clouded with anxiety. "Oh do you really think we're just three silly little girls," she finally blurts out. Reassured by my denial she says, "you see, the trouble with a lot of these music business people is that they think we're just three dumb chicks."

Now that's more like it.

Tattooed Tears

Directed by Nick Broomfield and Joan Churchill

(Contemporary)

THE Youth Training School in California is a kind of borstal for 17 to 21-year-olds. It was originally set up, with an abundance of good intentions, as a rehabilitation centre. It failed in this purpose and, as relations between staff and inmates deteriorated, became just another institution where offenders were punished, often under circumstances of considerable degradation. Once the liberal principles had been undermined, the system became more repressive than it might otherwise have been.

The disillusioned director resigned, but before departing he allowed Churchill and Broomfield access to the establishment, so that the outside world would learn what kind of institution concealed itself behind the euphemism Youth Training School.

Churchill and Broomfield were given pass keys to all parts of the buildings, and allowed to spend three months filming there. Because they were given the opportunity to become what was virtually another facet of the prison routine, the fly-on-the-wall documentary technique of Tattooed Tears carries, pardon the pun, total conviction.

Although some of the elements of the daily round are illustrated (most memorable of which is a chapel service with an Elmer Gantry hellfire preacher, the only genuinely crazy person on show), the film concentrates on the tantrums, aggressiveness and hostility that are bred in the unsympathetic environment. Brian, one inmate, warns the authorities: "The longer you keep me here, the more frustrated I'm gonna get. I've got a lot of goals I want to achieve, but I can't do them in here."

The tears of the title are streaming from the left eye of one offender, first committed for glue-sniffing, who treats his face like other people treat bog walls. For every year he spends inside, he tattoos an extra tear.

The film's a kind of US Midnight Express although that was cheapened by the director's seething imagination. Tattooed Tears we accept to be the whole harrowing truth, and nothing less.

Bob Wolfenden

Tattooed Tears is included in a series of films by Nick Broomfield and Joan Churchill showing at London's Electric Cinema Club for two weeks from November 12. It is also being screened at London's Scala cinema on November 26, with the nearly-banned Juvenile Liaison.

THESE days you can watch love movies that make Brief Encounters look like Patton, see horror without cameras panning to the ceiling during the good bits, see thrillers so complex that though they get solved at the matinee the culprit gets away on the evening show — you've got war movies packing shellshock, disasters without limit, into space with no strings, gangs, guns, war and unflinching gore so real you're supplied with a surgical mask on entering the theatre.

Why can't anyone give big laughs no more? OK, so Woody can still crease with the odd all-out gag that he feels won't spoil his overall seriousness but he seems to have fallen foul of the great comedians' pitfall in feeling ashamed of the 'pattiness' in his genius, in awe of the heavier heroes. Technicalities aside, Take The Money And Run was every bit as mighty as Manhattan though Allen knew, like Groucho Marx observed, that "The public have no respect for comedy... they think it's easy." Or maybe as he said in Annie Hall, "How much can an audience laugh? They're all luffed out." Mel Brooks' latter works still have their moments, but I remember Blazing Saddles nearly put me in hospital. Otherwise all the funnies come in spurts and sketches on TV, and comedy has reached a sad pass when you've gotta be in the right place at the right time in order to catch a good wheeze.

Monty Python realised the suffocation of conveyor belt

TV almost in time. They were surely the last great comedy movement/outfit that either wireless — and, Jesus, radio comedy is enough to make Mind Your Language riveting — or the gogglebox produced. Their first proper movie, Holy Grail, perhaps came too soon after their recession and coupled with filming conditions that almost killed off half the crew it was sprawling, half baked and forced, even if occasionally glorious.

And so to Life Of Brian, a movie that has brought about the wrath of every single church group known to the United States, has caused Mrs Whitehouse to poke her bugle in, and is awaiting the obligatory blasphemy trial as we speak. If the team had stuck with the original working title of Jesus Christ — Lust For Glory I doubt whether we'd have seen it at all. Anyrate, I've seen it now and I'm going to tell you to do the same. Life Of Brian is a very funny film.

Originally a series of skits about JC himself, director Terry Jones changed tack on reexamining The Gospels and discovered their subject was "quite a good bloke who didn't deserve what we had in mind." The gags and pieces in Brian instead home in on the people and politicians of the old world, the unquestioning pullability of the hordes, the howling parallels of the underground movements of the times and similar splinter groups that occupy and embarrass today's left wing.

John Cleese plays the leader of the Judean People's Front, an organisation hell bent on the downfall of the Romans only slightly less than they are on the destruction of their real enemies, The People's Front Of Judea. Also there's The Campaign For Free Galilee and two or three others tripping each other up and forever frothing policies and standpoints around endless secret meetings.

Of course, the main character is Brian Cohen (Graham Chapman). Brian gets born in the stable opposite from Our Lord and in the confusion — well, that much is obvious. Elsewhere in the film there are very few out and out biblical send ups, and the fuss that the religious groups have drummed up can only underline their blinkered uselessness and total lack of chuckle in the ranks. Like I said, Brian never claims to be anything more than a half assed bumbler with a domineering mum called Mandy, but it's the inhabitants of Judea that won't let him be. He repeatedly tries to put the hordes wise, but they won't hear of it.

Before I give in to the urge to reveal some of the countless thigh-slappers there are in this movie, let me just simply state that Life Of Brian is a dynamite oasis in a growing desert of comedy waste. Maybe we tend to think of the old days as the golden comedy era because the wealth of gems have a large bank to draw from. Maybe year by year the old times weren't so hot and BBC2 makes it all seem so beautiful. I dunno.

But, fact: I know you can laugh at Life Of Brian. I may have spoiled it for the people around me because of my enthusiasm and support, but when you see it, act like at a concert. Be open, whoop it up. Drink and participate. It's fun-fun-funny, I tell you. Try not to ponder why.

JAMAICAN LION INNA CONCRETE JUNGLE

"Didn't my people before me slave for this country?"

— Bob Marley, 'Crazy Beldheads'.

THE ELECTRIC sign on the pedestrian crossing on Sixth Avenue and 56th Street is flashing Don't Walk but Bob Marley keeps stepping anyway. Head back, legs pumping, arms swinging shoulder high, his slight frame moves with a determination and speed that startles even the hardened pavement pounders of busy midtown Manhattan.

Worse still for the surprised native New Yorkers, Marley's trailing a whole gaggle of stepping dreads behind him, half a dozen of them laughing and lurching round the sidewalk real dangerously in their attempts to match pace with the leader without actually breaking into a run. Two blocks back Jacob Miller — for he is among this company — almost took out a woman and pushchair on a blind corner.

Upfront Marley, wearing a mischievous deadpan face, jeans, trucking boots, quilted jacket and enormous woolly hat, shows no signs of slackening the pace. He's enjoying the confusion in his wake, his zen lesson. He's on business here so just walk these ten blocks or so from his hotel on Central Park to the rehearsal studio as quickly as possible, seen.

We hit the studios in about five minutes flat. Here The Wailers are to go through their paces in readiness for the seven shows they will play at Harlem's celebrated Apollo Theatre over the next four days. The buzz on the gigs is already around town and no sooner have we arrived than Marley's giving his first TV interview of the tour, sitting on stage with his red Les Paul draped round his neck while guys the size of elevators shovel cameras and lights around and an elegant black American lady shows Bob her teeth and asks questions like: "But tell me, where does your wonderful charisma come from?"

Bob looks away and laughs. "I'm serious," persists the lady, flashing her best smile.

Bob looks at the floor and mutters a long unintelligible sentence ending in an abrupt "RASTAFARI" to the camera.

"Well you're not making sense," sighs the TV lady gracefully. "But tell me, why are you playing the Apollo? Is there any significance in that?"

"Well, Marcus (Garvey) was there," begins Bob. An answer and a half later he's calling over the dapper figure of Wailers drummer Carly Barrett and the lurking presence of Jacob Miller to help explain the way it is to the TV lady. The camera and lights all have to be shifted again for this new development while Bob sits there plucking absently on his guitar, looking amused.

"The Apollo is an important part of our black heritage," says one of the Wailers party later. "I can't think of any major black international star who hasn't played there at one point — Bessie Smith, Billie Holiday, right from them people there to all the soul stars, everyone. That's one reason Bob has to play there, to put him in that tradition for people to understand."

The decision to play the Apollo is symbolic of the mood and intentions in the Wailers camp at present: to carry reggae and its message to the estranged soul of black America. In tune with the hard line theme of black unity presented on 'Survival', on this particular round of North American and Canadian Babylon by bus (and plane), the group will be aiming not so much at the white rock audience they garnered a few years ago around the time of 'Rastaman Vibration', but

The Two Horsemen Of The American Apocalypse

HUNTER S. THOMPSON: The Great Shark Hunt (Summit Books)

TOM WOLFE: The Right Stuff (Farrar Straus Giroux)

COMPARISONS, as they say, are inevitable. Coincidences are a little harder to fathom. So when Tom Wolfe puts out a book on the true grit life-style, the blood, sweat and tears (particularly tears) of the '60s forgotten heroes — the seven Mercury Astronauts — and Thompson beats him into the breach with a timely collection culled from twenty years devoted service to the gonzo cause, we can afford to hang loose and pick up.

Both The Great Shark Hunt — Thompson's first published book since Fear and Loathing On The Campaign Trail — and The Right Stuff are journeys to the heart of the great American Dream, observations from the ledge of edge city. Thompson and Wolfe have perfected ways of telling you what it is and how it was. If that dream is now a western nightmare and a soured promise to one, and a just-so-much-to-be-expected state of affairs to the other, then that only adds added spice to the proceedings. The same America that Tom Wolfe finds too freakish with all the good Dr. HST views with a jaundiced eye, its bad craziness threatening to chew him and spit him out like so much discarded tobacco.

Thompson's collection of his own work is sub-titled 'Strange Tales from a Strange Time'. The 42 year old Kentucky wildcat who used to kip off the tills in liquor stores, got dismissed from the Air Force for writing with too much candour and stood, unsuccessfully, as sheriff for Aspen, Colorado, under the 'Freak Power' flag, is now a celebrity on the campus and a hit in the book store, minor facts that seem to leave him completely unmoved. Thompson writes with an adrenalin charged cranked-up frenzy. As time goes by he just gets crazier. The Great Shark Hunt picks him up from the earliest days, reporting on the South American political scene at its wildest and most dangerous (reports first published in The National Observer). Thompson did his active typewriter service in all the hot spots, all the places where CIA agents were fomenting aggravation and silencing dissidents: in Mexico, in Rio, amongst the Brazilian Indians and the Incas. Thompson digs the dirt and spatters it across the page. His Strange Rumblyings In Aztlan, a piece originally in Rolling Stone, is almost a model of restraint for the gonzo prince but let him start describing the murder of Ruben Salazar, spokesman for the oppressed Mexican outlaws in Los Angeles and the cork comes off and objectivity goes to the wind in a torrent of gross, truthful description.

The Aztlan saga was the beginning of a friendship with attorney Oscar Zeta Acosta whose disappearance is discussed elsewhere in TGSM. The repercussions of that experience are vast and well suited to this enterprise; the use of first person narrator as an involved active participant can be traced through the '60s and into the '70s, the Age of Fear, with a rising gradient that reflects Thompson's deranged mind. The menace to society of the Hell's Angels are nothing compared with Richard Milhous Nixon and the dour inherent fascism of middle America (which is incidentally no reason for any European self-congratulation).

Through Thompson's drugged, drunken fantastic gaze you get a savage glimpse into the background of a multi-million dollar Presidential rat race — cold blooded murders and wire tapping added extras — plus introductions to the unreal worlds of Mohammad Ali, the original hippies, an itinerant road burn still looking for the mythical Promised Land, the seamy side of sports stardom, Jesus Freaks and Ballantines Ale. It's compelling, frightening reading but it is also very funny, ha-ha and peculiar.

Thompson's own hero is probably Joseph Conrad, although he never made anybody bust a gut and could never have seen his subjects with the same mixture of hatred and addiction that is here. Only Thompson could tell the reader that "I've always considered writing to be the most hateful kind of work" while chuckling over the fact that he's getting paid for it. That kind of masochism we can all relate to.

DAPPER Tom Wolfe published his own retrospective, Mauve Gloves And Madmen, Clutter and Vine, two years back but then HST includes a cautionary tale Those Daring Young Men In Their Flying Machines. ... Ain't What They Used To Be! (on the aftermath of the American space programme) written in 1969 so.

Wolfe's account of the first man to leave the earth, the supersonic tests, the wives who wait, is a refinement of the serialised epic called Post-Orbital Remorse that Rolling Stone ran in 1973. 'The Right Stuff' is Wolfe's catch phrase for the righteous, man over machine fraternity based in Edwards and Murac, who sold their souls to NASA in the '50s and '60s and won their nation's undying gratitude until they became the forgotten question in a trivia quiz where a Teflon non-stick pan is the answer.

Wolfe is a mainstream, polite writer compared to Thompson. His objectivity does work and is utterly convincing although it's been mooted that he treats the facts to suit his case: never trust a journalist, not even a new one.

Even so The Right Stuff reveals the most you could wish to know about the Astronauts without having been there. Wolfe brings John Glenn, Al Shepherd and Gus Grissom to life with an attention to wants-and-all detail that will absorb anyone who's ever wondered what it's like to step out yonder and look down. It isn't a glamorous picture. Wolfe accentuates the fact that America lost out in the initial space race with the Russkies and lost face in the Cold War incidents that shadowed NASA's mission, the Bay of Pigs, Kennedy's death, the Berlin Wall — all these loom above the triumphs of the astronauts.

And wouldn't you know that the right stuff, the lighter jock life-blood, was as prone to the boredom of desensitizing ritual as the next man's? First time John Glenn hits the orbital arc in his claustrophobic capsule he feels ... not a lot. "His launching was an utterly novel event in American history and yet he could feel none of its novelty."

Alongside the astronauts are the chimpanzees who made it all possible. Wolfe gets inside their heads too, describes the barbarous training programme that man and the primates underwent so that the American flag could be raised on the moon.

The righteousness of it all appeals to the Virginian renaissance man in Wolfe but you always come away feeling that the writer's objectivity is a version of cynical detachment. Mach five, mach six, 5000 mph, 17000 mph, the sacred 7, tea with Jackie Kennedy and the White House bouquets; it's all the same to Tom. Just as with Kesey or Babbs or Cassidy, he is fascinated by other people's extremities and idiosyncrasies, he even understands them, but he isn't finally involved.

Which doesn't prevent him being a genuine social historian and a sharp dresser to boot. It's a pity that The Right Stuff doesn't enter into the moon shots and the post-trip cosmic consciousness of the astronauts who'd been there and found their God. The accounts of Ed Mitchell's sudden attacks of radioactive ESP, or John Glenn's political and religious zeal after he hung up his suit were amongst the most fascinating parts of Post-Orbital Remorse but they aren't included here.

For now we have a lot of essential reporting on our generation from the two men best equipped to make some sense of the entire grisly shebang. As for those comparisons, Hunter Thompson makes a few.

With regard to Wolfe's New Journalism doctrines the mad Doc writes: "Wolfe's problem is that he's too crusty to participate in his stories. The people he feels comfortable with are as dull as stale dogshit and the people who seem to fascinate him as a writer are so weird that they make him nervous. The only thing new and unusual about Wolfe's journalism is that he's an abnormally good reporter; he has a fine sense of echo and at least a peripheral understanding of what John Keats was talking about when he said that thing about Truth & Beauty." The quote reveals sufficient about both writers to be acute without being bitchy.

Wolfe is urbane and as ice cold as a nuclear scientist (he took LSD once during the writing of The Electric Kool Aid Acid Test but never referred to that experience directly). Still, you only have to run up The Right Stuff against Norman Mailer's painfully liberal, moralising account of the moon shot in Of A Fire On The Moon, to appreciate the man's flair for putting his material under the microscope. After all, if Nixon had had his way both Thompson and Wolfe would have gone to the wall for their dedication to that amalgam of truth and beauty.

As Raoul Duke put it all those years back, "When the going gets weird, the weird turn pro." You've got them both here.

The Jam explore the grey everyday; TONY STEWART meets them halfway

THE JAM Setting Sons (Polydor)

CHANGE. It's something Paul Weller wrote about on 'To Be Someone', that sour story on 'All Mod Cons' about the kid who wanted to be famous and then wasted it all away. There was a typical Weller air of inevitability in the song, capped perfectly with the characteristic twisted sneer of "But didn't we have a nice time?"

Of course Weller is unlikely to self-destruct because he's too clever by far. He has always adapted to change and rarely taken risks. Three years ago The Jam started with a tried and tested formula of early '60s Who, Weller so besotted with Townshend that imitating the grandfather's style bordered on monomania. But he added a quality of his own: just enough aggressive belligerence to stand to the right of original punk's storm of indignance and insolence.

Weller created for himself a cosy, comfortable position. With their sharp suits, laundered looks and unthreatening demeanour, The Jam's image segregated them from 'subversive' punk. They were middle-class entertainment, seemingly going for mass, and not cult, acceptance. And it took three albums to find their own identity and step out of the warm security of imitation.

'All Mod Cons' was a brilliant album where Weller discovered his artistic focus. It had followed their debut 'In The City', which was vibrant but erratic, contrived and too much of a '60s Who appreciation society, and 'This Is The Modern World', which was one-dimensional with the slogans and catch-phrases for a youth movement, also musically shoddy with Weller all too conscious of the significance of imperfection.

'All Mod Cons' took the best of both and dumped the conceit of the rest. It was adapted to the prevalent musical climate and has since brought about a change in modern rock 'n' roll. It was a classic, musically mature and lyrically a broad description of its time: the emotions and characters and lifestyles; the classes and the fashions; the escapism and the blunt realities.

On those terms, there probably isn't another '70s album to match it. But Weller knows all about change. While 'All Mod Cons' became a celebrated masterpiece (and Mod celebration) that allowed The Jam to leave behind that surrogate-Who stigma and establish Weller as one of Britain's few great writing talents, its critical acclaim became an impediment.

Just how do they top that? Write the fourth chapter of the Mod manifesto and invite even stronger comparisons between Weller and Ray Davies and Townshend?

No. 'Setting Sons' is a major development and something of a departure. Basically The Jam are disassociating themselves from Mod before they're buried with it.

Musically the style is familiar, if more measured and weightier than before, and there isn't one dubious song among the nine originals. Lyrically it's characteristically Weller, involving social scenarios and observations on class and fashion. Even so the album is still the greatest risk they've taken in their careers.

Apart from 'Saturday's Kids' — a brilliant piece of reportage: "Saturday kids live in council houses/Wear v-necked shirts and baggy trousers/Drive Cortinas/Trimmed dash boards/Steins on the seats — in the back of course!" — 'Setting Sons' doesn't possess the easily recognisable youth tribalism of 'All Mod Cons'. Its scope has wider connotations but, paradoxically, its subjects are narrower and less easy to identify.

It's not a 'concept' album in terms of a story but 'Sons' has a recurrent theme, dealing primarily with change: growing old, growing apart, growing whimsical, growing cynical.

"No it wasn't enough — and now we've gone and spoiled everything/Now we're no longer as thick as thieves."

'Thick As Thieves' is possibly the best song Weller has ever written and the key to the album's theme. Second track in on side one, following the ridiculously superficial 'Girl On The Phone', it's the long, detailed story of a friendship and the closeness of that relationship: "We stole from the schools and their libraries/We stole from the drugs that sent us to sleep/We stole from the drink that made us sick/We stole anything that we couldn't keep/And it was enough — we didn't have to spoil anything/And always be as thick as thieves."

Then comes the eventual breakup: "But something came along that changed our minds/I don't know what and I don't know why/But we seemed to grow up in a flash of time/While we watched our ideals helplessly unwind."

The song puts the others into perspective, each one explaining why the group split up: 'Burning Sky', the busy businessman's letter of excuses, 'The Elton Rifles', a tale of a misguided, impotent revolutionary challenging the establishment — "Thought you were smart when you took them on/But you didn't take a peep in their artillery room/All that rugby puts hairs on your chest/What chance have you got against a tie and crest?"; 'Wasteland', a bleak grey landscape, Weller's metaphor of life; 'Private Hell', the tale of unfulfilled dreams as a woman goes into depressing middle-age. And even the opening of 'Little Boy Soldiers' slots briefly into the theme before becoming an anti-war song, with Weller finally resigning himself to the futility of protest (in much the same way as he does on 'The Elton Rifles'): "These days I find that I can't be bothered/To argue with them well what's the point."

'Girl On The Phone', the somewhat misplaced 'Heat Wave' (about as interpretative as 'In The Midnight Hour' on 'Modern World') and Bruce Foxton's 'Smithers-Jones' are the only contrasts to the bleak, distraught and depressing theme. And the latter — the ironic story of the conscientious toff who gets sacked by a sun-tanned boss, thus reinforcing the general impression that life's a tragedy, no matter what — is the major stylistic departure, sweet vocals over a curtain of strings.

Strings? Is this the modern world or not?

The rest of the album Weller carries alone with his stunning vocals, chopping, abrupt and propulsive guitar, and a batch of melodies and arrangements that put many of the songs on 'All Mod Cons' into the shade.

There's the power of 'Thieves'; the ragged anger of 'Private Hell'; the mellow prettiness of 'Wasteland'; the theatrical drama of the three movements in 'Little Boy Soldiers'; the staccato, slashing guitar on 'Burning Sky'.

And the hooks and harmonies — the commercialism — are all there, with drummer Rick Buckler and bassist Foxton following Weller's order implicitly. More than ever, it's a one man band, away now from fashion and transient fads. 'Setting Sons' is Weller's own personal statement.

Unlike 'All Mod Cons', Weller is setting himself a daring test: the success of this album doesn't rely on familiarity and identification, but on his talent alone.

It's Paul's best album yet; almost his first solo album too.

HUGH CORNWELL AND ROBERT WILLIAMS
Nosferatu (United Artists)

FACES may change, but 'Nosferatu' is basically very old hat. Very old wavey, you know — the prissy arty type rockstar who is just bursting with so much creative vibration that he/she has to step outside the belittling constraints of group practice to realise the ripeness.

I think old Mick said this last week in his piece, so I'll leave the Stringers out of this, and — garlic and cheap crucifix about my puny person — creep a little nearer the Great Object.

Hugh has supposedly found in Magic Band drummer Robert Williams a Like Mind (maybe they should call themselves The — simple! — Like Minds) and the daring duo employ Ian Underwood, Ian Dury and two packets of Devo to mix the cake up as nutty and fruity as possible. These guest appearances are another old hat notion.

Nothing wrong with getting friends to make noises for you, but it does depend on how it's done.

On 'Nosferatu' it comes across like all those boring early '70s solo works, just a smug scrapbook, a 'what we did on our holidays' home movie with silly cameos. As for comparisons with The Strongers, sorry, the fact is that I don't listen to their records. Not on any special ideological nag, I just don't listen to the vast majority of records released in this rocky rocky world by your Banshees, your Skids, your Kids, Tourists, Moorist Blips, whoever. Like — I have no particular need or desire to consume every last film, TV programme, or novel in this world, knowing a priori that I will be bored to foathing by most of 'em.

What little I have heard of Hugh's boys tells me they sound rather more like a Wimpey road construction crew than does 'Nosferatu', and — Hugh's voice and lyrics aside — my aesthetic advice to Cornwell would be to stick with Williams. Although given the choice between the Captain and Anyway, I know you're dying to know all about the concept in hand. The Cornwell/Williams 'concept' seems to be lyrical concentration on one or two subjects which just about cross over into one another. This doesn't necessarily mean that they attempt any diagnosis or analysis thereof; as Hugh himself sez, 'Nosferatu' is but a soundtrack for a film which doesn't, and will never, exist.

What could be worse? Most soundtracks, musicals and weepies like Taxi Driver aside, are the most useless form of listening activity known to a person, even when one has seen the film. So, 'Nosferatu' is a soundtrack with words for a film without images, a collection of 'descriptive' statements: mysteries and maudlinings. It's very dull.

The five song 'Nosferatu' cycle on side one has all the kind of 'weird' and 'spooky' electronic noises you'd expect it to, as obvious as its words: 'He may die but he'll go on Nosferatu'.

'Losers In A Lost Land' and 'Irate Caterpillar' are plain chaps sailing, Hugh's 'I Am A Method Poet' voice going thud thud thud, and the background muzak sounding like Zappa at his most

Cornwell in the cold. Pic by Pennie Smith

Cryptophilic

Carnegie Hall. The version of Cream's 'White Room' means about as much to me — what a spring chicken! — as a version of a Strangers song would, and the final track, 'Rhythmic Itch', is the only vaguely bearable noise, featuring as it does the Mothersbaugh Brothers from The Dead Democrats or some such other Los Angeles 'punk' band.

Like Julie Burchill once said of Devo, their failing was/is that insistence on acting completely nuts, striving for an effect they could easily achieve by keeping elements of the projected image and emphasising it through a distorted 'normal' facade. The able Mothersbaugh voice on 'Rhythmic Itch' is the only bit of noise on 'Nosferatu' that's at all creepy... but then we all know what creeps Devo are, rocky stars like the rest, interesting only by default (that's one default line one must occasionally sink under).

The Burchill/Devo premise is even truer of the side two, which is supposed to be 'about' — Hugh? — 'aspects of perversity'. Like side one's subject, the trouble is that the straightforward insistence on what's 'real' amounts to all the predictable points along the landscape. Like a protective rail, the narrative song edges that ramifying flow of images and sounds in a single direction (straight forward), constructs a law (what is to be seen and heard, what is to be related, a context of rightness), regulates a point of view.

Your cheeky chap Dury does a bit of predictable Dury cheeky chap yelping here and there, but otherwise the pristine Cornwell/Williams motorik trundles along, very smart alec, very elusive, very aimless. A snatch of typically slack lyric from the last track, 'Puppets', writes the project's own epitaph: 'They dance by themselves/They whine and soar and seasaw/Mime and pretend to speak'.

More rocky music pointing at obvious — or MYSTERIOUS! — things in an obvious — or MYSTERIOUS! — manner.

All I can say is — to carry on Master Kent's Led Zep/Strangers analogy of last week — for all their arrogance someone like Zeppelin never sunk so low as to solo; at least Page keeps his black magic box to himself.

(Charly)

'BALLBUSTER', a re-release of an album issued here by Red Lightning some five years ago, is a marvellous compilation formed from the Texas R&B sides that Gate cut for the Peacock label during the late '40s and '50s.

Indicative of the fare that stacked up alongside the Wynonie Harris, Louis Jordan and Joeiggins shellac on the black jukeboxes, the tracks include 'Uproar', an instrumental boogie filled with Gate's programmed - to - excite guitar licks; 'Dirty Work At The Crossroads', a thoughtfully arranged affair that charted in '53; 'Rock My Blues Away', a powerhouse piece that cocked a snoot at the ersatz of Haley's Comets; and 'Just Before Dawn', on which the man from Orange, Texas, shoulders his fiddle and bows the blues like some acid-demented Paganini.

Historically important in its roots of rock vein, 'Ballbuster' also makes it at music level and, despite the scratchiness of the 78s from which it was mastered, is an essential buy.

The Prisonaires album, compiled from Sun recordings, many of them previously unissued, is lower strata stuff, albeit interesting. A doo-wop group who got together while imprisoned in the Nashville State Penitentiary, The Prisonaires are best remembered for writing and recording 'Just Walking In The Rain' while still doing time.

Three years later, in 1965, Johnnie Ray covered it and grabbed a No. 1 in the NME charts, though by that time the now released Prisonaires had moved on to become The Sunbeams and The Marigolds.

THE FALL

Dragnet (Step Forward)

"IS there anybody there???" calls Mark E Smith across the lead-in grooves to the first moments of the second Fall album.

Well, that's a tough one alright and, surprisingly, the answer this time around is not "Ain't nobody here but us chickens," but a loud and emphatic "Yeah!!!"

This is a good, hopeful start, and its optimism is not betrayed by what follows, because what does follow is irresistible and unique, a happy, challenging music of unforced energy and simple vision, just everyday inspiration, seized in the instant before it vanishes, placed in gaitful employment for the enjoyment of us all. It's a Bunglers' Bop and it's easy to learn so don't be scared to dance it. Its only steps are forward.

What with three members gone beyond, and Marc Riley moved from bass to guitar, the one constant connection between 'Dragnet' and its predecessor, 'Live At The Witch Trials', is the persistent presence of Smith. (The new bassist is Steve Hanley, the new drummer is Mike Leigh, and in place of regular keyboards there's Craig Scanlon on extra guitar). 'Witch Trials' was an encouraging innovation when it appeared, but its lingering image, for me, is scrappy and drab, more frustration than pleasure — whereas the present record, with a single bounding leap, sees The Fall free and on their feet.

They're still cryptic, given to littering the product and package with enigmatic nonsense and carefree incoherence — often witty, sometimes wiffully difficult, maybe — but I've simply decided not to let any of that detract from the album's indisputable charms.

Obscurity either intrigues or irritates — and in The Fall's case it's more usually the latter, I find, until you stop losing sleep over 'meanings' and let them get on with it.

The problem is (no 'problem' at all, really) that The Fall aren't out for any of the stock rock responses, and whilst a lot of us are coming to terms with it individually, we've yet to develop a shared language to express these reactions with — no styles of dress or dance, no new vocabulary or recommended repertoire of attitudes.

It's this distance from the rock and roll mainstream that makes this stuff difficult to describe and to market, even if I believe The Fall do fall quite naturally in direct descent from all the best and truest youth music of these decades. The form might be different but the spirit is really intact — spontaneous, self-obsessed yet generous, oblivious to tradition and the 'right' way of doing things. All you've got to do is drop a lot of unnecessary preconceptions and it's yours for the taking.

The Fall put it better: "It's Original Article. Not romantic not sub-intellectual not 'tough' re-cycled three chord big boots. . . Snug in natural accents in front of unaffected music. 'Dragnet' isn't a mass of confusion covered by reverb and a control board." It is, however, more conventionally attractive than the earlier work, although it lacks the benefit of Karl Burns' distinctive drumming. The two new guitars make their presence felt with invention and freshness and Smith's songwriting grows increasingly accessible; even the flat Mancunian delivery seems more in sympathy with its material than before.

The Fall's Mark Smith. Pic by Kevin Cummins

Of the numbers themselves, it's the opening 'Psykick Dancehall' that's the most striking: "Medium dischord", a great break-out. 'A Figure Welks' is said to be "a song written during a long walk home wearing an anorak which restricted vision by 2 thirds". Yeah? Git down . . .

'Muzorewi's Daughter' is a lapse back into naughtiness, notes the reviewer sternly, nicely tribal-flavoured but still an endless repetition of something only barely worth saying once or twice. There's more of that jingly thump through 'Dice Man', their one brief encounter with orthodoxy, a mangled Bo Diddley-ism: "They say music should be fun like reading a story of love. But I wanna read a horror story."

Mark E Smith is not, so far as I'm aware, any sort of genius; nor do The Fall represent some magical chemistry of talent. They seem to be no more than more or less intelligent people who take chances with noise and words, for fun, for curiosity and for badness.

But anyone could do that. . . Well, perhaps they could. But if only they would. (Is there anybody there?)

IMPORTS

SHERIFF, who have an album called 'Sheriff' out on the Observatory label, are one of those totally anonymous bands who are not very good, not very bad and not really anything at all. A critic's nightmare, in fact. Presumably they could boogie on forever, cutting tracks that seem hard to recall even seconds later. Which is why the only thing I can remember about their made-in-Virginia offering is that it's low on playing time — one side clocks in at just 13.24 — and is actually proud to do so. "This album has less than 17 minutes music per side to preserve the full dynamics of the music," claims the blurb. What dynamics? What music? Really, I can't remember. Time to join Amnesia Anonymous, I guess!

Next, a newflash to announce that B. B. King's quintessential 'Live At The Regal' is now being imported on the U.S. Pickwick label. Which means you can lay your mitts on a copy for just £2.95. Great stuff, eh?

The other good news is that Rhino's 'International Elvis Impersonators' Convention' 12" EP is also around right now. Of tremendous cultural importance to the free world, the disc features renditions of Presley favourites provided by such as Yankel Prestin, who began performing Elvis impersonations back in '34; Hound Dog Fujimoto, the protégé of Colonel Taho Parkoto and the owner of seven gold-plated rickshaws; plus Gunga Maharesley, an entertainer best known for his efforts in persuading the Indian Government to rename the Taj Mahal, 'Graceland Mansion East'.

The sleeve that houses the remarkable efforts by these superb impersonators provides evidence that all involved not only sound like Elvis but also look amazingly like him. Elvis Von Berman (from Argentina) appearing in a typical Presley steel helmet; Elvisini Prestiano (from Italy) playing the same sort of concertina El used on all his gigs; and Israeli Elvis Prestein sporting that beard we knew and loved so well. One of Rhino's most important releases to date — even surpassing their kazoo version of 'Whole Lotta Love' — the 'Impersonators Convention' makes any collection of indispensable rubbish complete.

Stuntman (Virgin)

LISTENED to en masse, the latest batch of albums from German chamber-rock label Sky serves mainly as evidence of the massive influence of Tangerine Dream on their compatriots; unfortunately, rather than taking this influence as a jumping-off point for other things, some German musicians would seem to be (already) completely defined by it, producing soporific albums of cosmic redundancy redeemable only as a safe alternative to Mandrax.

The Gothic pretence of 'Nordborg' and 'French Skyline', for instance, is quite excruciating. 'Nordborg' consists of two twenty-minute pieces, each taking up an entire side with stern, glacial inanity of the worst kind, whilst 'French Skyline' is pure, undiluted bourgeois synth-slop. Which is not really surprising, since protagonists Earthstar (an American band, apparently) believe co-producer Klaus Schulte to be "perhaps the new Wagner or Beethoven of our time" (1). Wolfgang Riechmann's album is an odd, fragmentary affair whose opener, 'Passage', hints at Neu with its phased drums and flow, but which deteriorates into a kind of sub-Camel maudlin bombast on side two. 'Nuff said.

When a person's self-portrait consists of such uninspired (and uninspiring) dribbles of muzak as does Hans-Joachim Roedelius', what are we to assume about that person? Is Roedelius really as monodynamic a personality as 'Selbstportrait' suggests, or is this the result of over-exposure to Eno's ambient music hobby-horse? Even Edgar Froese's 'Stuntman' has more going for it than 'Selbstportrait', and that's innocuous enough — the patter of tiny rhythm-generators, the swish of grand symphonic curtains, the cheerful bounce and waspish warble: you know the stuff. Nonetheless, 'Stuntman' is altogether less pretentious, more approachable and light-hearted than Froese's earlier work, both solo and with T. Dream, and for this we should be thankful. Gunther Schickert's 'Überfallig' falls somewhere between Cluster and Neu, most satisfying on the opener, 'Puls', a cyclical piece based round a rolling semi-flamenco guitar figure and echo-slapped snare drum, with flute and treated guitar dancing on top, and with other sounds, voices and treated detritus providing a constantly-changing mid/background behind the hypnotic foreground.

Cluster's 'Grosses Wasser' suffers in part from the faults of Roedelius' solo album, especially on the side-long title-track, whose opening — sparse piano chords and wide-open spaces — invokes apathy before the piece is really under way. For seven or eight minutes, 'G.W.' presents an empty, barren landscape with little discernible detail but large blocks of atmosphere, replaced for the main body of the track by a comically martial percussive cycle studded with rude, brassy blares of synthesiser — a mocking fanfare of defeat whose inherent humour's soon exhausted.

The shorter pieces which make up side one are more to the point. There's no "beginnings" or "endings" here, just "middles", fragmentary clips which hang together better as a whole than the title-track, running smoothly from a casual canter ('Avanti') to a full-tilt gallop ('Prothese'), slowing to a trot with 'Isodese' and strolling out with 'Breitengrad 20' and 'Menschmal'. The cumulative effect is surprisingly satisfying, a meal made up of snacks of diverse taste. Which leaves us with Michael Rother's 'Katzenmusik', an album which, for both warmth and cohesion of construction, stands as an object-lesson for all the above.

The unity intimated in the track titles ('KM 1' to 'KM 12') is achieved by the re-statement and metamorphosis of basic motifs, like restructured echoes — thus 'KM 5' sounds naggingly similar to 'KM 7', for instance — and by a standardised set of musical elements.

Rother's probably the best exponent of the "layered" technique around today, and here he achieves a quite breathtakingly luxurious interweaving of overdubs, assisted as usual by Can's Jaki Leibzeit on drums.

Rother has an acute awareness of music's power as an emotional stimulus, a faculty he applies with quite ruthless logic. But 'Katzenmusik' doesn't dominate or pressure into submission; it entices, gently and seductively, and it's difficult to resist.

Michael Rother. A latter-day siren, maybe?

ROY SUNDHOLM

The Chinese Method (Ensign)

WITH no pedigree to speak of other than his legendary stint as bass-player in a defunct pre-'76 runt-band called Ratbites From Hell, it comes as a surprise to discover that Roy Sundholm has returned with what could possibly be The Finest Rock Album To Emerge From Oblivion this month.

Sundholm has borrowed liberally from a broad spectrum of influences. The shadows of Dave Edmunds Rockpile loom large, while the similarity to Graham Parker is so conspicuous in places it sounds like a tribute to the worthy. The only significant problem here is that Sundholm's none too colourful singing fails to provide the personal presence that his material deserves.

Each one of Sundholm's ten compositions bears the hallmark of a skilled and imaginative songwriter. There are no superfluous tracks. Impelled by a refreshing dollop of raucous power from the uncredited backing musicians, this is a commendable first offering.

"The Shoes are one group in a million who defy form and call their own shots. Their official debut, 'Black Vinyl Shoes', recorded by four kids in a bedroom, was rightly heralded as a 70's yardstick, a breath of fresh air in a cynical kitchen."

"'Present Tense' is a record which defies expectations. Anyone who suspected that The Shoes' opening salvo was an accidental stroke of genius is in for a pleasant surprise. The band have co-opted producer Mike Stone to guide them through the pitfalls of the studio but haven't sacrificed one jot of their unique sound or their ratio of stone melodic brilliance."

"As it is, WEA might as well close down the presses and go home for the rest of the year — they don't need to release another record again. Ever."

THE DAMNED
Machine Gun Etiquette
(Chiswick)
"LADIES and gentlemen — how do."

A warm-up burn-up through 'Love Song' pushes everyone's blood to boiling point and over... not content with maximum effect The Damned shoot their way into 'Machine Gun Etiquette', blatantly stealing from Gary Glitter's 'Rock 'n' Roll' and firing blindly, loudly and at random... their equipment seems to collapse around them and is left strewn all about but they plough on, engine racing, no brakes, no cares... wherever they're going they'll get there before they intended because intentions and pretensions don't exist for The Damned... no band, just four individuals who know that the only way to play a song is to make a noise and keep on going... and there's no other way to listen to them then at full volume, bass heavy, preferably from the downstairs flat... but — hark! — 'Melody (Lee)' begins with ten seconds of sympathetic piano and you think those Damned ol' boys have gone soft... no, here they come now, bursting in, ripping and mashing it up, stamping it down... and you loathe them for Sensible's repetitive HM guitar riffs in every song, riffs that you could hate if only you didn't overlook them and think of all the zillions of HMs whom Sensible parodies and think that if they played with such crazy abandon instead of taking themselves so seriously, then the world might be a better place... until The Damned released another album the same as this, full of songs like 'Looking At You', 'Liar' and 'Smash It Up', all delivered without a sniff of interest and swallowed up in spewing instrumentation and chewing Vanian fangs... yes, 'These Hands' belong to him, that demented circus clown, and they strangle artistic pretensions, until "you are turning blue" and drowning in his maniacal laughter, laughter directed right at you for heralding such a thing as Damned 'music'...

ANDREW CYRILLE, JEANNE LEE, JIMMY LYONS
Nuba (Black Saint Import)
CYRILLE and Lyons are old compadres, having battled together in Cecil Taylor's boiling group for years. 'Nuba' is in a more gentle vein but it draws immense strength from the combination of Cyrille's itchy, disturbed drumming and Lyons' beleaguered intensity on alto sax even at low temperature. Jeanne Lee's coolly sensual vocals leaven the mix and her lyrics seal the desert connection: camels, oases and hot sands.

The first side winds through a parched setting, fractious alto over popping thumb piano on 'Cornbread Picnic (Maize)', near-release on 'The One Before Zero', held in check by Cyrille's refusal to break cover. The remainder burns more brightly. 'Nuba 2' reruns the opener with more muscle, Cyrille steaming over a shopful of percussion. Lyons, brilliant throughout, finally breaks into the extremes of register here; on his own 'Sorry' he tirelessly flows through an aching spiral of sound. Scarcely credible that this excellent set was cut in a studio in Milan, my sandwiches tasted gritty for days afterwards.

MARIANNE FAITHFULL
Broken English (Island)
BEFORE we get started on the music...

Marianne Faithfull occupies a precarious position in rock and roll iconography. One of the first people whose lives were ruined by contact with The Rolling Stones, she was a teenage beauty, a convent-schooled folkie, the prototype of the Rock Old Lady, the prototype of the Rock Wronged Woman, an actress of acknowledged ability who despite it all never collected the big jackpot.

A life that doubtless reads better than it lives. In 1979, she has returned to the rock fray with an album that, even if it is not directly and literally autobiographical, is intended to gain resonances from what is publicly known about her career: drugs, despair, rejection, revenge and guilt. Rock noir, rock verité, rock for people who have considered suicide but decided that junk is snuff.

The hazards of this kind of venture are obvious. Artists who create art from the actual stuff of their lives risk being told by outsiders that their lives are clichéd or disgusting or pathetic if the resulting work answers those descriptions, which — at various points — 'Broken English' does. It is also harrowing, absurd, flabby, self-pitying, self-indulgent, chilling and powerful; very much, in fact, like the Lou Reed and Iggy Pop albums on which it occasionally appears to be modelled.

It begins again — Ms Faithfull at the time of her last 'comeback'. Pic by Ian Dickson

Cheap thrills, bleak chills

Since Faithfull's initial recording career in the '60s, her voice has altered most dramatically. What was initially the pure, girlish sound of the middle-class folkie has been eroded by too much whisky, too many cigarettes, too many downers, smack (of which any is too much), too much crying, too much despair — here we are reinforcing the myth again! — into a harsh, haggard, cracked, keening instrument, the perfect classic Woman Wronged voice.

And now we talk about the music.

Produced by one Mark Miller Mundy (a name new to me) and featuring — among others — Stevie Winwood, Steve York, Darryl Way and the Kokomo singers, the formula calls for a crisp, steady rhythm section with guitar and synth parts that drift and float in a manner either gauzy or menacing according to what is required. Faithfull's voice cuts like a rusty knife, nags like toothache.

The material is a mixture of covers chosen for their alleged appropriateness and originals written by the artist and/or her friends and companions. Two of the choices — Shel Silverstein's 'Ballad Of Lucy Jordan' and John Lennon's 'Working Class Hero' — are highly dubious. The Silverstein song is pure bathos, and — leaving aside Faithfull's right to assume the mantle of 'Working Class Hero' — that song is simply too much a part of John Lennon for anyone else to sing it. I would be interested in hearing a version of the song that could convince me otherwise, but this isn't it.

The aforementioned 'Why'd Ya Do It' with lyrics by Faithfull and celebrated unorthodox person Heathcote Williams is the album's other grand failure. A torrent of cusswords and sexual/scatological extremism, it seems to have been included for no good reason other than to bait The Sunday Express into one of those orgasms of outraged decency so beloved by connoisseurs of the ludicrous and grotesque.

When the album is effective, though, it is extremely effective. The title track — which fortunately opens the album and therefore provides a valid reason for sitting through the dull bits on the offchance that there will be material of similar quality later on — carries a disturbing blend of the soothing and the sinister, a genuine mixture of pathos and menace which sustains you through the unmemorable 'Witch's Song' to 'Brain Drain', an insidious bluesy piece written by Martin Brierley (who if my memory serves me well is currently playing bass with Ian Hunter). 'Brain Drain' delivers one of the album's key lines: 'I've got so much to offer but I won't pay the rent/I'd like to buy you roses but the money's all spent'.

It's a line that cuts home: it recalls all the people I've known with real and palpable talent whose problems prevent them from functioning in any practical manner at all, and — sad to say — too high a proportion of those people have been women. The line resonates eerily all through the next track, 'Guilt', which is as brilliant and quintessential a junkie's anthem as it has ever been my misfortune to hear.

'I feel guilt, I feel guilt,' intones Faithfull, 'though I ain't done nothing wrong I feel guilt' before moving to the chorus 'I never gave to the rich, I never stole from the poor, but like a curious child', her voice cracks on the last word. 'give me MORE MORE MORE MORE MORE MORE', modulating down alongside a looping, syncopated bassline. But the song's most chilling moment is yet to come, when she sings 'I feel blood, I feel blood, though it's streaming through my veins it's not enough...'

And your skin starts to crawl. Records like this serve absolutely no purpose except voyeurism and a cheap frisson. Junk is not a useful metaphor for any aspect of the lives of non-users, and I'd prefer to save my sympathy for people whose suffering is not self-inflicted.

'Broken English' is, at its occasional best, an eerie and chilling record for connoisseurs of the bleak and squalid. At its worst, it's a cheap holiday to someone else's misery.

Marianne Faithfull has only followed in the footsteps of other professional victim-type artists: she has made a record which is little more than a collection of symptoms. She has pasted sequins on her scars and charged admission for customers to come and gawk at them.

On the other hand, she is an actress by trade.

LIVE!

The Moody Blues

Wembley Arena

Breakfast in dread: the first reference sprung from a rare, glassy moment of self-pitying catharsis; purging my fear of the known, the imminent, the dramatic personae, I whimpered to an adjacent friend that the actors in question could but be constructed entirely of Ceylon tea and brown rice and everything nice.

How could they be so nice? No, don't you see, said the friend, in tones suggesting that my angst-ridden analysis was somewhat awry, these actors represent rather dirtier roots: beer and meat-pies and all things base; that's what Moody Blues are made of!

The Moody Blues: five ordinary guys! A penny for your thoughts!

Five pleasant guys made good; not quite white magicians. More, well, metaphysical milkmen, Goldtop Merlins, alchemists from Boots. They've achieved a somewhat largely successful fusion — sulphur on sale at Sainsbury's? — of the 'sublime' and the 'ridiculous', not to mention 'the ordinary'. Their illusory, meaningful 'sublime' is in fact wholly ridiculous, and I doubt they go in for vice verses (some kinda Chinese dish is it, John?).

Who does know the secret of The Moody Blues' box? Such a sticky confectionery; such a viable commodity. £8.50 for a ringside (seat, anyone?)

Teatime in Wembley: here I am asking questions, on your behalf, in the dark. Or rather in the half-light, that penumbra where I always seem to remain, when that which is the very popular face of public entertainment (The Moody Blues) advances its phosphorescent antennae. White bread and cold circus, anyone?

Moody Ray Thomas does the funky Patrick Moore.

Like any definition of The Moody Blues phenomenon does not necessarily define the (pleasure) principles upon which it is presumably based. For a 'good night out', The Moody Blues' teatime in Wembley Arena was pushing it a bit, pleasure principle wise, as far as I can see.

The Gargantuan Wembley Arena — the kind of place one can picture an authoritarian regime bringing crowds to chop off their limbs — necessitated binoculars to see the attraction, good wages, patience to get a drink, and a sense of absurd comfort for the concrete corridor one was provided with to drink the drink in.

Are The Moody Blues really quite psychoanalytically low and cunning? In fact, have they recognised that a sensation of pleasure unpleasantly experienced remains mysterious and inaccessible?

Isn't life strange? Isn't the lager expensive? Aren't these seats uncomfortable?

The opening act was a solo American sensitive guy, just him and his acoustic guitars. Rock and roll! (someone shouted. Rock and roll! said the sensitive guy. You must be from California!)

It was that sort of a Saturday night.

I endured some minutes of his blowing from town to town, being out in the sun and forgetting everyone — open tunings, closed meanings — before severe pins and needles spread from thighs to head, the physical to the cultural, and demanded my respite.

Free lager by 8er 14: just an ordinary guy — cardigan, perm, pendants — asks me about the football scarf I am sporting — Norwich City FC; watch out West Brom! — which is stuck roughly in my jacket pocket to the end of concealing a quart of brandy I'd smuggled in (this all sounds criminally autobiographical, but bear with me).

He goes to the lav, and his wife — cardigan, perm, ceramic badges — asks me if I want one of their surplus drinks (bars in Wembley Arena were populated like a bakers in a bread strike).

"It's strange, isn't it...?" she remarked, apropos nothing. Fearing the addition of 'Life' to the question, I plunged nose in free lager and tried to look sympathetic. She meant the audience, and went on to conclude that half of suburbia seemed to be there.

What she liked about the gigs she'd been to — Dire Straits, Pink Floyd — was the dressing up, the razzmatazz, and this lot were having none of it.

In short, I remarked, it was rather like an office party, was it not?

Her husband — I guess the analogy doesn't stand — came back, and agreed: not for him the Wembley Arena stewards in smbands, bands in pubs was more up his street.

He read Melody Maker, but she seemed to be onto something. Bacon and: on came the five guys.

The 'mystery' of the Moody Blues commodity isn't obvious. They are obviously five plain guys who make lots of pennies by playing at being a particular commodity, which a particular market would appear to need/desire rather a lot: the music is but part of it.

The 'mystical' character of the commodity does not arise from how it is consumed by this audience; rather, it arises from the form of the commodity itself. The mysterious character of the form — for there is clearly nothing mysterious about the five guys themselves as such — consists simply in the fact that the commodity reflects back the social characteristics of the product.

What is left unspoken by The Moody Blues — for there is clearly very little actually said — is that their audience craves. The attraction of The Moody Blues is their double life. The Moody Blues are just five guys, but what they have come to signify is high on a whole cosmos, a genre unto themselves, a Theatre of Ideal Home Impressionism.

Their home is the Universe, but on stage they look like five footballers on the back of a lorry for an impromptu signabout to promote their boutique's new clothes collection.

The sound was limp, elsewary; tinny drums, silkysoft strummy guitars, Dr Who keyboard bleeps, choral voices and, worst of all, that loathed sound of sounds, the flute. (Do you know anyone who likes flutes?)

The words: reflections of my mind... leave myself behind... days of future past... isn't life... AMEN.

As a modern-life warehouse sell-out of sub-Gurdjieff style palliative mysticism, it makes Californian 'rock and roll' seem positively gnostic. As entertainment it lacks everything but lustre. There is no exaggeration, no eroticism, no puffs. Not something radical like Status Quo or ELP, nor sensual like Tangerine Dream, nor vicarious like Leonard Cohen, nor as lamentable or professional a proposition as say, Wings, or ELO.

As modern minstrels they're somewhere between a converted Bob Dylan and a perverted Baron Knights (in...). A workingman's club male Charlie's Angels, with Tolkien tacked on... full permed phantasms of plain guy made good imagination.

But... reality! The flow goes as far as inbetween-song raps, where thick bacon-rind Birmingham accents spew forth bloodys aplenty, harsh jokes about 'life on the road' and social diseases. Rather soiled the spiritual nappy, that.

Homeward, I should cocos: the flautist scraped restlessly at the insides of metaphysical emptiness; clusters of notes sprung like large toads, hidden under the cover of night's dark cloak, yet squashed still by bigger lorries.

Embroidery embroidered. Pale ate plasma transfused through the cheapest champagne imaginable; all the terror and ontological verve of the worst American situation TV programme.

I rather like them, in theory.

But in practice these lyric poets are as far from sublime invention and resolution as a Tory government; for the purpose of enlightenment, they make an ineffectual process of decorations. They are Laura Ashley wallpaper come to life. Their popularity is guaranteed. People keep their arms folded and come dutifully: sit back and think of the babyratter (?!).

We took our leave, my astral friend (how right you were!) and I. Left to the sound of nights in cheap perfume, and the hiss and whoop of the annual firework ritual — where at least one knows where one is with a guy.

The Muddy Boots... 7 A penny for your shares, guy?

Goldtop merlins and a cosmic breakfast

Supertramp

Wembley

They collected eight gold albums across Europe last year, and sell out the massive Wembley Arena without so much as a hint of breaking sweat. But there can be few bands further removed from the realities of late '70s rock and roll than the bearded, musically bloated Supertramp.

Indeed, these distant cousins are so far away from what's really going on today that constructive criticism is all but impossible.

My initial reaction was one of sheer numbness: they bored me stupid, but to actually pinpoint whether they were 'good' or 'bad' is not as easy as it seems on one level. But to be safe, I'll plump now for the latter.

Wembley Arena, of course, is not my ideal of a rock venue. An aircraft hanger yes, but never a hall conducive to live music. It is simply too big.

Still, it took me about half the set to realise that the major problem besetting Supertramp is not so much the impersonal size of the hall but the dearth of even a modicum of real emotional excitement.

The five main instrumentalists took mildly disinterested. Obviously extremely competent musicians, what they possess in technique, they lack in inspiration. They make you realise what all the latter day rock and roll bands are on about when they use words like 'commitment'. They mean energy and soul, pure and simple, of which Supertramp have none.

What the audience — a passive mixture of university and middle-of-the-road office types — come to appreciate is the perfection of the whole circus. There isn't a note out of place, no gaps in the sound, nothing left to the imagination.

Even the band's renowned humour is confined to the odd homogenised half-laugh from a set-piece aside between songs.

Last week the Evening Standard called them 'cosy', but even that is a little wide of the mark because the band never got close to the audience. Their attitude to the crowd is more often than not patronising: 'We're recording a live album tonight and if you're good enough, you might be on it... we might even call it 'Live In London'."

Supertramp songs make a lot of prissy, elaborate fuss in going nowhere, but to their credit most numbers are kept short with none running over three or four minutes, with the exception of an extended quasi-funk workout towards the end. And again most songs — like the two recent singles 'Logical Song' and 'Breakfast in America' and the inevitable 'Dreamer' nearer the end — are built around standard keyboard riffs.

The sound is an infernal, eternal procession of plinks, plonks, fizzes and squeaks with as many as three piano / mellotron / synthesizer implements used, the only relief coming from the occasional crisp sax solo from reedman John Helliwell.

'Dreamer' is introduced as "our rock and roll number". The irony is that comparatively, it is just that, the rest of the material being so listless. The old warhorse, the band's first hit, naturally has the punters out of their seats for the first time all night... only for them to sit down again, as any self-respecting and civilised dude would, at the end of the song.

Elsewhere, audience participation is limited to the odd outbursts of spontaneous communal handclapping every time a familiar riff appears or the light show changes. The lights, of course, are spectacular; but, for the size of the rigging, the effect they created was nowhere near as imaginative as, say, Elvis Costello's Dominion Theatre shows last Christmas.

But just in case the lights alone are not enough to take your mind away from the mind-numbing blandness of the music, there are plenty of other props and effects: extras in fancy dress from a pantomime gorilla to a tasteless Nazi-saluting Hitler and, finally, a video screen on to which trains a portrait of Winston Churchill and, ultimately, a panorama of outer space are projected.

Preentious isn't the word for it.

And that is where we leave Supertramp, drifting simlessly through the cosmos, cocooned in their contrived grandeur.

Blue Oyster Cult

Brighton

Whoops! Someone boomed.

The Brighton Conference Centre is a vast seaside meeting place, frequented by political parties, the TUC and grey-suited men. Sometimes they feature rock and roll bands, but the place is entirely unsuited to the spirit of the beast.

Maybe it's the absence of lasers or the commercial failure of 'Mirrors', but there was no danger of Blue Oyster Cult packing out this 6000 capacity hall. If this opening night was indicative of BOC's current drawing power in these shores, then someone is going to be doing a lot of hard thinking in two weeks time when the accounts have to be settled.

The band stuck it out through a combination of a new found enthusiasm and sheer bloody mindedness. They've been playing in clubs back home and there is a straight cutting edge to their performance as a result.

Hell, they even open up with 'Dominance And Submission'.

The difference between this show and the last time BOC toured here is that 'Spectres' material is replaced by 'Mirrors' tunes and no one is too sure whether they approve.

If Meltzer's absurd 'Dr Music' is gutsier on a stage than on plastic, then the band certainly didn't do justice to either of their potential production numbers — 'The Great Sun Jester' and 'The Vigil'. Eric Bloom and Buck Dharma couldn't be faulted for their vocals, but the momentum of these dual tales of star-fallen icons and star-gazing humanoids simply flew into the rafters and refused to come down.

All credit to the Cult though for refusing to be down-hearted by the open spaces. Roesser's lead work on 'Mirrors' captured the subtlety of the song and Albert Bouchard's delivery of 'Cities On Flame' was nothing short of gonzo magic: serious heat.

Now the Cult have said goodbye to their lasers there are no visual distractions in the middle of the set. They've also said goodbye to the people who only come to check out the beams. Good riddance is the conclusion if this 'Astronomy' was an indication of how they fare without 'em.

Dharma flips in and out of Bloom's pure vocal and Allen Lanier's prophet keyboard with the dexterity of a mini-Hendrix, for sheer melody this is ounce for ounce classic Cult.

'ETI' was similarly inspired but 'ME 262' drags on like an old relationship. It's dull as ditchwater and they should kiss it off for good.

In any case 'Godzilla' is a superior example of their warped dynamics, leading to the high point of the evening, the third world war definition of heavy metal that segues Joe Bouchard's admirable 'Hot Rails To Hell' into 'Born To Be Wild' and the inevitable 'Reaper'. I'd go for the closing chords of the single hit, a fine song but definite millstone.

The final 20 minutes suggested that BOC should have their jet lag and initial looseness ironed out by the time this show hits the provinces. Maybe they'll let Bloom ride his Harley chopper onstage at Newcastle; it would certainly be funnier than watching the pod explosions fail to go bang!

Overall, this Brighton rock was average Cult. If they leant more heavily on their repertoire and allowed a greater degree of flexibility into the set then Britain would see the band operate at the same intensity they generated in the clubs.

They're old and practised sea dogs these days, the elements of surprise are inherent in their make-up. BOC can still burn your eyes and melt your ears.

Asay-See-Dee-See! Asay-See-Dee-See! The ritualistic call and response comes from people in silly schoolboy uniforms and those wearing denim jackets held together only by Rush, Styx, Kiss and Iron Maiden badges. It's like a cross between the Chelsea Shed and a Catholic Mass and the gig hasn't even started yet.

For those who think Heavy Metal bends and audiences never change, be assured they do. Back in the days when the genre first started audiences at least pretended to be discerning by waiting to see if the band were going to be exciting before getting delirious. Such considerations no longer apply in a show requiring and receiving stock responses, suggesting that there is no such thing as an above or below average performance.

At least the reception for Def Leppard didn't reach levels of mindless ecstasy.

A standard five piece, they are not so much an identikit HM band, more an identikit of other identikits. They've learnt their poses well (ooh, the things Joe Elliott can do with that mike stand: everything except sing with it, in fact). Joe even tried to draw a few lewd remarks about women but as yet he lacks the insulting arrogance to carry it off.

Only one number stood out — 'Time Is On Our Side' as their piece de resistance; a long one with slow, sensitive bits. So sensitive that bassist Rick Savage even cupped his hands over his ear to make sure he was singing in key.

As an impersonation of a Heavy Metal band they were only slightly inferior to what The Barron Knights could have done. But The Barron Knights have been at it longer.

Def Leppard should be enormous.

Goodbye lasers goodbye audience

BOC's Eric Bloom and Buck Dharma. Pic Chris Horler

Fashion note: HM fans still wear flares, but the bands don't. Why is this?

Angus Young of AC/DC, of course wears short trousers and a schoolboy uniform which, as an attempt at humour, is ironically appropriate. As a guitarist, his one attribute is his energy, but there must be better ways to exert it rather than shooting across the stage, putting in the biggest ham performance since Rod Stelger in Waterloo.

From the first bar of 'Live Wire' imaginary guitars, pained expressions and peace signs were everywhere. I took the coward's way out and brought forth my notebook.

As visual focal points, Angus Young and Bon Scott strike an interesting contrast: Angus looking enthusiastic, Bon showing arrogant indifference. It's hard to decide which is the less commendable attitude.

AC/DC don't go in much for slow sensitive bits, they just bash it out. So the gig was a predictable mounting frenzy to its inevitably triumphant conclusion. Perhaps Angus' striptease should be mentioned as a high(?) spot.

What a wagi! We laughed until we stopped.

The music was ugly, and strangely enough the almost exclusively male audience was the ugliest crew I've seen outside of a Glasgow Rangers game.

But here's the rub: do they like the music because they're ugly or do they become ugly as a result of it?

Whatever, it was a fascinating gig... and if a tarantula spider were to place itself in front of me I wouldn't be able to take my eyes off that either.

What this music has to do with rock'n'roll is no longer even a question worth asking. It's clearly a sub-culture on its own and its devotees neither want nor deserve any better.

It's their world and they're welcome to it.

John's Boys The Nips

Marquee

About half of London's teenage population seemed to descend on Wardour Street to see the Woking mods play a 'secret' gig under the banner of John's Boys. Tickets sold out fast, so hordes of Jam fans were sent packing home. The lucky ones who managed to squeeze into the Marquee saunas were ready to lap up the best show in town.

First on were The Jam's buddies, The Nips led by the near legendary Shane O'Hooligan. After a count-in, they were tearing through a set of love songs with a difference — definitely not the sort you'd hear Simon Bates spinning to his housewives.

Shane projects a vindictive jealous character, the kind of 'romantic' who must surely be hard on his girlfriends. For instance, the chorus to 'Vengeance' is "I'm gonna hit him, I'm gonna kill him, I'm gonna really make him pay for what he's doing", and that's probably about a geezer who just spoke to his bird.

With Blonde Douglas playing a lethal guitar, a young kid doing a great drummer's job and the delicious Shane on bass, The Nips line-up seems stable for a while at least, and they should attempt gigs more often. Straight, I can't see Shane gracing the centre-spread of My Guy, but his voice should come under the scrutiny of musical connoisseurs, and it's put to ample use on their current single the rocking 'Gabrielle'.

The Nipponese invasion could well start at home, so be ready.

Gruff, stocky John Weller played the MC, and he was followed on by his boys — the mighty Jam.

Opening with 'Girl On The Phone' (sounds like an Undertones' title), this crew couldn't put a foot wrong all night. The crowd erupted and were grooving to the end as the band played a set of new songs mixed with oldies but goldies, and going insane to the likes of 'Strange Town' and 'When You're Young'. Then they would suddenly seize up, trying to suss out the new tunes. 'Little Boy Soldiers', 'Thick As Thieves', 'Saturday's Kids' and the brilliant 'Private Hell' were a few newbies previewed. The sacred 'Away From The Numbers' was also tackled successfully, much to the audience's delight.

Weller was magic, cutting those neat jingle-jangling chords with cool, professional ease, backed up by the funky mad-dog-on-speed-lookalike Bruce Foxton. At the back, Rick Buckler pounded out the big beat.

The new songs seem more subtle but grip you immediately with their infectious hooks. Paul has matured into an excellent writer, laying down statements and views with poetic, cynical and amusing insight; an example being a few lines from 'The Eton Rifles': "What a catalyst you turned out to be/Loaded the guns then you run off home for your tea/Left me standing like a guilty schoolboy." Also Foxton's scribbling is getting better, as 'Smithers-Jones' testifies with the great put down: "Take a seat, take the weight off your feet/I've got some news to tell you/There's no longer a position for you/sorry Smithers-Jones."

Nice boss, eh? They ended with 'Down in the Tube Station', violence pouring out of the song so that we could all imagine being there. They crawled back and done a couple of encores and that was it.

As I sipped up my beer and collected my fags, I saw Weller holding court to a group of spellbound kids. I wanted to stroll over and talk but I lost my bottle. Perhaps another time.

Return of Sender

Wilko Johnson

Music Machine

Wilko's new Solid Senders are a pared-down affair with the bare bones of guitar, bass and drums. The outcome is a frail, sparse R&B that finds Wilko gnawing at his roots with more immediate affection than ever before.

The band amble on stage while the Music Machine disco blares on as if it's the star attraction. Any such aspirations are immediately doused as a pale yellow light illuminates and casts dark shadows across Wilko's harsh features. He picks up his guitar and you know everything's OK.

'Messing With The Kid' and 'Everybody's Carrying A Gun' are a light introduction with Wilko seemingly in low profile and content to thrash out rhythm. He growls his blues, but there's a suspicion that he's holding back and lowering his way carefully into live performance. That familiar menace has yet to stamp its swaggering authority.

The gut-wrenching 'Walking On The Edge' sees things right.

Wilko kicks into crashing, haywire solos that smash through the safety-net of Russ Strutter's bass and Alex Bines' drums. He paces restlessly from amp to the edge of stage in blatant exorcism of lurking demons and the crowd jump feverishly to the madness.

These Solid Senders coast on an endearingly tinny sound that recalls the timeless spirit of ace mono recordings. This is Wilko in his element wreaking sharp, violent slashes of black-and-white that lurch, leap and prise out urgent soul. Slap yourself for grinning like an idiot.

'Cairo Blues' catches him warbling exotically and craning his neck as if half-bent on petrifying a few flies along the way. His voice, though frail, is raw and totally at ease throughout because his music is on tap from his heart.

Right on time comes the straightforward BB blues of 'The Whammy' spliced by guitar fills that jump off kamikaze-like at all angles.

Wilko's shock-red lead flashes behind him like the entrail of something hidden and nasty and by this time his eyes are stretched wide and blanched sheer-white by the spotlight. His eyeballs roll demonically to the convulsions of prime R&B and his guitar pirouettes in his huge hands.

There's no looking back. They burst into Dylan's gloriously vindictive 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window' and, crammed tight with layered tension and spat out by Wilko in a crawling drawl, it sounds like an ideal single to wilt the nation's airwaves.

'Paradise' is a blast of Feelgood-type mastery with a riff that wedges in your brain and, however much you shake yourself about, it won't come out. From then on it's easy cruising with 'Back In The Night' holding the road nicely till the long, choogling stretches of 'Highway 61'.

Tonight showed Wilko, a granddaddy by appointment and stature, fighting-fit and ready to last another course. His music is bruising direct and slides off your back in fluid shivers that leave you stranded in a sopping puddle. Right now there's not a lot that can do that.

Can this man be the new Bob Dylan or more? Wilko, don't ever disappear again.

The VIPs

Music Machine

Ever had the feeling you were missing out? You know, the kid who sits in the corner at a party and wonders just why everyone else is having such a good time?

I got that feeling on watching The VIPs turning out a set of indifferent originals and botched-up covers to a highly responsive audience. On 'Stungart Special' everyone formed a conga and chuffed around the floor going "Whoa Whoa!" at appropriate moments.

After a vociferous denial that they were a mod band (they'd recently supported Squire), I was surprised to see them turn up on stage in cartoon mod gear — thin ties plaid shirts, neat crop — and launch into a number with a beat suspiciously reminiscent of early Weller.

'Runaway' was given an interesting vocal interpretation, although no one else seemed to notice that the singer was as flat as a pancake. 'This is the sort of song Raymond Chandler would have written,' made me choke as they introduced a song called 'Dead On My Busty' (I'm sure that's what he said).

Given the current state of rock in the UK, groups like this are not only unnecessary, they are positively undesirable. They can only drag us back into the valley of the shadow of boredom from whence the new wave pulled us not so long ago.

The VIPs are neither good enough to warrant their name nor bad enough for it to be funny. They're just a bunch of nice guys playing a bunch of nice rock songs competently.

Well, can you think of anything worse?

Nell Norman

The Teenbeats

Bridge House

In the backwoods of E16 is a refuge from dockland industry and high-rise living called The Bridge House. On Monday it's crammed with 400 smart, '60s replicas. Monday is mod night.

The Teenbeats climb the stage to excited anticipation. Immediately Huggie Leaver, vocalist extraordinaire, clasps the mike the audience is twitching. He has a personality that reaches every cobwebbed corner of the saloon. The sound is young, fresh and fun, with Huggie a mini-whirlwind pulling the onlookers into the set with him.

The punters are not disappointed with the rip-roaring numbers battered out by drummer Dave Blackham and Huggie. They pound out with un-mod precision songs like 'Can't Control Myself', (their current single) and 'It Doesn't Show', with a trace of Mekon guitar entwined. The combination of rhythm (Paul Thomas) and lead (Ken Copsey) makes for a hard colourful guitar sound, most obvious in the catchy 'Teenage Beat'.

The set concludes with 'Strength Of The Nation', the forthcoming single followed by tumultuous applause and a rowdy version of 'Hippy Hippy Shake' helped along by support band The VIPs and star-struck members of the audience.

The Teenbeats are not a mod band, but they do play '60s music, remnants from the days of the Stones and related to today's rock scene. Really they are not far removed from that lost culture of spiky-headed enthusiasts who graced the stage in '76. And there are still some punk left-overs in the act. Siouxsie-type arm and leg swings and harsh vocals give away the mohair suit and Hush Puppy cover-ups.

But I enjoyed myself at the Bridge House.

BOB MARLEY

get lost... but today there's no turning back, come too far and turn back now, it just-must have to go...

But some people a go save still and all these people are one people who believe in something, believe in God, fear of true conscience and the works of Ras Tafari.

Reggae seems to be a universal rhythm: they dig it in Europe, America, Africa, Japan...

Yeah man, everyone, no matter which rascallat place 'im come from speak to His Majesty and hear him seh: "Until the philosophy that hold one race superior and another inferior is finally and permanently discredited and abandoned" — until this, until that the way that speech go... Hear Him say this and the whole of Africa have to jump it.

Him even seh that to Castro and 'im have to bloodclat jump it. Say it to Russia and dem have to jump to it. Y'see Ras Tafari am God man. Rascallat! That one statement alone mek Him God...

I'd have thought Castro was helping liberate Africa after what you said earlier. If Castro go help Jamaica, Jamaica go socialist. And if America go help Jamaica, then it go capitalist. Suppose if Jamaica were Rasta then no one would be interested. Go deeper and see what survival Rastaman would have if the government would run Jamaica Rasta.

Psychological warfare go on with germs mix in it. A terrible war mon. Because check the war in Ethiopia now and seh 'bleh blah bum bum'... Dem seh Ethiopia starve and write it down as history. Well alright, look and see — if them know the people starving why them never come help if so kind? No, them butcher and conquer and capture. So dem nah go help so nah bow to them. So this is how His Majesty the best again 'cos him never bow to them. I know dem have technology, technological understanding but dem nah help you with it. That's because the technology is God to them and dem no know God.

Have you seen Lee Perry recently, Bob? Is he OK?

Yeah Mon.

We've heard strange reports in England that he's gone crazy.

Mebbe the Punky Reggae get to him (laughs all round)... Scratch alright mon.

Are you glad you made that record? 'Punky Reggae Party'?

Me glad me do it y'know. Really. A lot of people seh it was kinda letdown thing, that I let myself down. I did still y'know. But still something seh try get into it a little, with 'Rejected by society' and dem ting... but Punky Reggae is not really my thing, me prefer to leave them people alone, try to get more of a spiritual type o'thing.

What did you think to African music? Well dem have a different music, some I couldn't even understand. When I see people dance I realise how wide music can be, cos I know music a play and me can't dance to it but me see people dance to it and dance good too. Me want fe dance wid dem nuff to see if me can feel it, cos y'can't just feel it so, it different... far east, far east Rasta, a man sing some rascallat tune deh. Me go a club see a bradren sing and the man can sing. When me go to Ethiopia me no expect anything like that.

You were just looking at the 'Intensified' album — there's a bit of a rude boy craze in England right now, white youth more than black. What do you think of that, as one of the originals?

There's tension everywhere, too much tension...

You don't think that being a rude boy is the answer to tension?

Well it help — at least you become rebellious for roots stand for rebel. It must work out because Jamaica now just jump on Rasta — the youth dem no pass Jah but still people just call dem Rude Bwoy and dem rude boy become Rasta, so all a dem rebel; rude. Rasta... for if me never know there was a God one time when I walk as a youth me was well well gold and well well bad to man but me always know seh 'Well boy me can't hit a next one. Me feel so strong me 'ave to defend him.'

The Pope was in New York recently. Did you read about it? He played Madison Square Garden and Shea Stadium, it was like rock and roll gigs. He's even got a record out.

It chert yet? There are 70 million people a go buy it, dem buy't man. The Pope have a number one tune to bloodclat! Well I don't think I wanna sing again inna dis...

Pope have the number one spot but that no bloodclat good for we mek a number one tune do you hear? And then the whole record business get more interesting, more meaningful. You'd have the Pope, you'd have Rasta, and Rasta lick 'gainst the Pope and 'im can't survive if him enter record business him can't survive. Dem who go to disco and to rockers leave him right out man (laughs).

Seventy million people members y'know. When him dead 70 million dead with him. 70 million people really wanna dead? Dem soon find out 'im just a figurehead. Babylonian... Rome, y'know, is the Antichrist because dem know Haile Selassie is the Christ but dem no tell it.

How do you feel about Christians? Not Roman Catholics but say Christians who believe that the Pope is the Anti-Christ too?

Well the poor Christians never really get a chance to understand yet. Someplace people misinterpret something. If a man come up with no great education more than read and pick up the Bible and see "God is the King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Judah" and seh "Oh my suffering life, look out deh see who is the conquering lion of the tribe of Judah 'cos me a suffer and from me a suffer me have nothing to lose."

And 'im look out deh and see Haile Selassie and know 'im God.

Me accept him in flesh, spirit and truth, and Him show himself to me in different ways and mek me surer. Everyday see I Him. Even when you run it down to ideology 'im have the best. Like you have Marx, Lenin, or Capital and even there 'im is the best.

A lot of people look at Ethiopia and see a poor starving country and they wonder why Selassie did nothing to help his people.

Well, yes... Is true God is God, Him don't live like a film show, there's a whole international universal world in front of him. Because Him seated in Ethiopia dat nah mean Him love the people more than somewhere else.

When you tek conscience in a man now, all the people who seh Ethiopia was starving, dem could help feed the people. Cos big America knew, big Russia knew, big anyone knew but nobody give any help. Dem no wanna give anything without you take capitalism or Communism with it.

I check it another way again; in the days when Mussolini attacked Ethiopia him spray mustard gas and I am saying today that them spread famine gas, so even if the people eat them crippled same way. This is just war strategy. But who have eyes to see will se't y'know. Cos it's just mankind a do it to mankind, whether they come from Russia, Africa or anywhere, just mankind on the face of the earth. But man will be kinder to man. Pure propaganda them spread 'pon His Majesty, international propaganda.

We no lean on anyone cos we is Rasta. We're not sold any hype. It's a very dangerous too because when you're Rasta you stand up inna middle and that's dangerous, you come like the blaze between the fire — y'have two pieces of wood and the blaze come between, the two piece of wood catch a fire. (Loudly.) But I and I no fight fe nothing y'know — we is what we is, we supply the way prophecy run it, that in this time now we come to our heritage of culture, our ancient culture on earth. As it was in the beginning so shall it be in the end because in the beginning everything was perfect and so everything have to go back to perfection again.

Re: Rock Against Sexism — Abortion.

Surely the cry should be, "No Woman, No Girl, No Child should ever have to stoop so low or crawl so far as to have to take a human life."

Shouldn't we be "rocking" together to make sure all human life is held up and prized above all else, think of those little girls who hardly know how they became pregnant let alone why, or the young mums who "can't cope" any more and ask why.

Making abortion legal didn't stop unwanted pregnancies, it hasn't made life more bearable for those unable to cope with living (just something else to treat with a pat on the head and a bottle of Valium), what it has done is push the problem further and deeper away.

"Take it all away and all's well!" ... It isn't well and it won't be until we all ask why. You'll be given a variety of answers to that, ranging from "bad sex education" through to "poor social conditions". The answer to those answers is to spend money on the real care and welfare of those crying out for it. Instead money is poured into building up our armed forces, on artillery, on anything but you, me and tomorrow.

It's cheaper and easier to abort a new life than it is to give it a helping hand, a bit of care and some love.

Please remember to ask why. Veronica Monk, Bicester, Oxon.

Re: Stuart Johnston's ULRO Rock Against Sexism gig review.

Saying that all students are totally ignorant of the real world, is like saying all rock journalists are totally in touch with the real world. Duncan E. Lamb, London. Yeah, that's right. What's your beef, exactly? — M.S.

So Deanne Pearson ungraciously attempts to win her journalistic spurs by slagging off mod mercilessly. First she berates The Purple Hearts and now The Chords — fortunately though, she fails miserably.

Dear Deanne, why commit the cardinal sin and write about something you don't really understand — mod isn't wearing a parka with the right badges on it but rather the attitude of mind that develops with musical taste. Who cares a shit whether or not The Chords wear two-tone pyjamas and hush-puppy slippers — mod is about music and not expensive Carnaby Street garb. And that's where The Chords are at — a factor overlooked by Miss Pearson. I've seen The Chords seventeen times and they've always been and always will be musically brilliant.

One last question Deanne — those people you talked to in Birmingham, had they been standing up the front or, as I tend to suspect, standing with you at the back posing in the bar?

Less bigotry and more representation. Michael the Mod, London SE18.

Unfair! Deanne Pearson hardly drinks at all. Seven pints of lager usually suffices. — M.S.

After reading your article on The Chords, I am itching to tell you of their origins, in particular the "various obscure bands".

I knew (sorry, experienced) The Chords when they were wait for it, Organic Peroxide and played classics such as 'Nights in White Satin', 'Something', and 'Sweet Home Alabama'. I even have a tape to prove it. One drummer they had was the only musician in the group. Debbie H. London, SE17.

I would just like to say that I'm fed up with letters each week saying why the group slugged off last week was really not true, and why Ian Penman (who is really a poor struggling looney who can't help it) is such a shitty guy, and why is NME going on a down hill slide and a load of other dull heavy metal (meaning boring) type letters. The real letters are the ones about starting new trends and this one is one. It's called being a ... revolutionary. So instead of complaining about the price of records go and invade EMI. Another alternative is to play the record twice each time so you get better value. Sex, violence and hipness is all acceptable as long as it's revolutionary. So if you feel this is the life for you just don a dirty combat jacket and a black beret and be revolting. Julian Bywater-Lees (The Revolutionary), Maidenhead, Berks.

Throughout this mod revival thing, one question has never really been answered: What is a mod? Ian Page cries, "I'm a Mod!" because he wears a suit, a parka, a tie, a neat haircut, and washes regularly. Is that it? Have we missed something!

The original mods were a vain, overly self-conscious lot, whose only aim in life was to bash up any 'Rockers' that appeared, and look pretty while they were doing it. What are this generation of mods about? From two very confused, dejected Punks, Paula and Jackie, Trentham, Stoke-on-Trent.

I reckon, without wishing to sound a clever b., that I spotted two big blunders in the otherwise enjoyable Quadrophenia when I viewed it at my local flea pit. In a shot of Jimmy riding down a road somewhere in London you saw a new model Ford Capri (which weren't even invented in '64) and among others a new edition Renault or Fiat (I'm not sure which). Secondly, on the seafloor at Brighton a lad who resembled a sudehead rather than a mod was seen to be wearing a red, white and black football scarf known as the bar design, which as far as I know was unseen until the early '70s.

Overall, the authenticity of the film was very good and it seemed strange how these discrepancies crept in to it. This must surely rank as one of the most sensible letters ever sent into NME, right? Thomas Lynn, Middle Herrington, Sunderland. Sensible, certainly, but a bit irrelevant, Tom. You could not pick on the cock-ups all day — an Inter City 125 roars past Jimmy's window, Heaven Can Wait is showing at the Brighton ABC, etc. — but the fact remains that Quadrophenia, on a limited budget, brilliantly captures a mood of the time. Anyway, big budgets are no guarantee against anachronisms: in The Viking Queen some berk's wearing a wristwatch, in Lady Hamilton Big Ben is heard to strike 50 years before the bugger was built, in One Million Years BC a DC-10 nearly decapitates the giant pterodactyl and in Manhattan three Roman chariots whizz past Woody Allen (Are you sure about this last one? — Ed.) — M.S.

Y'know Jimmy in Quadrophenia goes walking up the hill after riding the scooter off the cliff. Well, he probably went off to be a hippy (surprise, surprise!)

Well, all you mods, punks, assorted grebes, don't start growing your hair and get spaced out yet 'cos the Tiller Boys are gonna get here first. Face the '80s with something new, Woodstock's just a bird in a cartoon. Don't fall for their hype, be different, be a Tiller Boy. If you write an article on hippies, like you did mod, I'll come round to Carnaby Street and demand a job. Remember there is no love in this world anymore, we've got to find new ways, not revive old ones and the hippies way did not work.

Added to that, I know some hippies and a revival would just be a destructive hype, so don't have anything to do with it, NME. Scared Scot, a Tiller Boy, Croydon.

Down here in Worthing there are no mods or rockers to be seen. No punks or tedds, just kids on pushbikes with long fringes and Chinese plimsols. You guessed it — the Tiller Boys are here. Let's hear it for middle class identity.

Jack and Neal, Worthing. I suspect that you winging pantywaists known as Tiller Boys don't have the answer to anything. — M.S.

Is this democratic England or communist Russia? Where has the freedom of speech gone today. 'God Save The Queen' and 'Anarchy In The UK' were censored and now Crass, because of their anarchistic and blasphemous views in their songs. Only John Peel plays any of these and even that isn't that often. Is this country going communist? Whoever's in power there will always be a government.

G. Crassfries, Isle of Wight. Quite an observation. If I was in power I'd dump the Isle of Wight right off. — M.S.

Whatever happened to singles at 45p. Whatever happened to ITV Television. Whatever happened to British summers. Whatever happened to The Rich Kids. Whatever happened to the days when you could go to a football match and not get beaten up. Whatever happened to British Leyland. Whatever happened to LPs at £2.25. Whatever happened to The Osmonds (thank God). Whatever happened to Liverpool in Russia. Whatever happened to Revolver on a Saturday Night. A Buzzcocks fan. Whatever happened to your question marks? — M.S.

A band of rebels known as 'Bandits' appear in the new Dr Who series. These long-haired, gruff-voiced beefcakes are unwashed, shabbily-dressed and have a craving for metal heavy, perhaps?) Could this be Motorhead? One Female Who Buys Rock Records, Somewhere North of Sheffield. P.S. They didn't sing or play music — but does Motorhead?

Surely The Slits have more finesse than Patti Smith in the art of producing a record cover. Honestly, what would you prefer: a bare breast, or an unsheathed armpit! C.S., Somerset. P.S. Don't let Monty Smith get hold of this letter first. We all know his opinion ... I have absolutely no opinions on breasts, bare or otherwise. But I have one or two unsheathed armpits of my own, thank you very much. — M.S.

I walked through London Road, Barratland, Charing Cross and Bridgeton to see Rangers play Celtic and did not get spat on, kicked, punched or get beat up.

Does this mean the end of violence? Ian Paisley, Saltcoats, Ayrshire.

Where has all the violence gone? The Bognor and Worthing Mods, Rosie Lee's Cafe.

Maybe you can tell me again: what is the function of a music paper? A worried reader in Holland. Apparently to incite our readers to violence. And I think we'll start by warning them about you tulip bashers who mince around in clogs. — M.S.

1980 is the year of the Disco haters. I don't know Sounds address; would you pass it on to them? The information, I mean? This is what the Press is all about, isn't it? P. Harrison, Exeter. I thought Lou Grant was what the press is all about. — M.S.

Please say hello to my Auntie Melba and Uncle Roo in Fremantle, Australia, who read NME real regular, honest, but it's too late to send my Christmas mail (for 1981). Thanks for the poundstretcher! Daniel 'Girldays Street' Miller.

I feel that this letter is the best yet to appear in Gasbag and I say this without any thought of overkill or indeed wandering thoughts of merely trying to make a point of my own disregarding the music subject matter of the rag and moreover I will not accept that anything I am prepared to have put into print might be in bad judgement and I refer especially to the possibility of some prat calling this the worst one liner he has yet sent. Phantom of the Bag. That's the worst one liner I've ever seen. — M.S.

I've got a bet with my mate that I can get more letters printed than him by Christmas. One-Nil. C.W. (one pint richer).

I have come to the conclusion 'enfin' that all your short, witty, fairly terse short letters are not sent in by waggish patrons of this noble paper, but are made up by a little man (probably Morley) shut away in one of your dark offices in Carnaby Street, speeding his head off. I know all this because when I'm speeding I say just as stupid and unimportant things too. To undo this highly probable theory, you will have to print this letter. Hang on though, this ain't a short letter anymore! Ah shit, an' I thought I was onto a winner there. Catch 22 fan, Soton, Hants.
