or Rag'n'Bone Man, as he's better known – is the kind of performer
the UK's music scene was built upon:
self-made, self-styled and extremely bloody talented. Having honed his craft in pirate radio, honed his craft in pirate radio, open mics and hip-hop nights before putting that bluesy voice to work, he's an artist who – as he admits in his cover feature – is not easy to fit in a box. He's also a humble dude, as NME's Hamish MacBain found when he joined him in his hometown of Brighton.

Two more Brits destined for greatness in this week's mag are south London's Sampha and Yorkshire teenager Billie Marten, both of them proving that the UK's new music scene is more vibrant than ever. We're also proud to announce the recipients of the VO5 NME Awards 2017's highest honour - the Godlike Genius gong - which this year goes to the iconic, excellent and all-round amazing Pet Shop Boys. Roll on February 15, where they'll be closing the ceremony with their typical panache and huge tunes. Here's hoping for 'Go West'...

WHAT EVERYONE'S TALKING ABOUT THIS WEEK

Love trumps hate

Stars of the music and entertainment world ioined thousands on the streets to protest Donald Trump's 'Muslim ban' and state visit

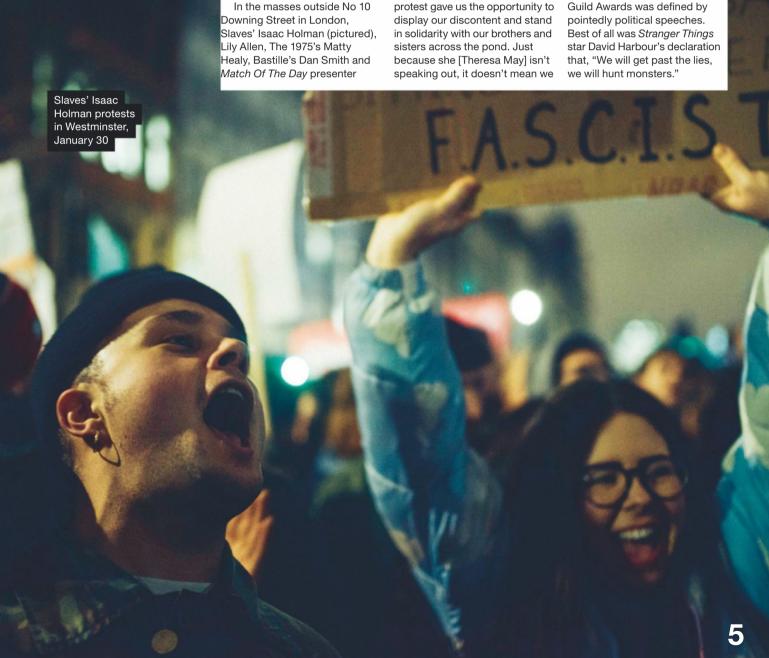

ON MONDAY, THOUSANDS took to the streets of cities across the UK in protest against Donald Trump, his travel ban on citizens from seven Muslimmajority countries and his forthcoming state visit to the UK.

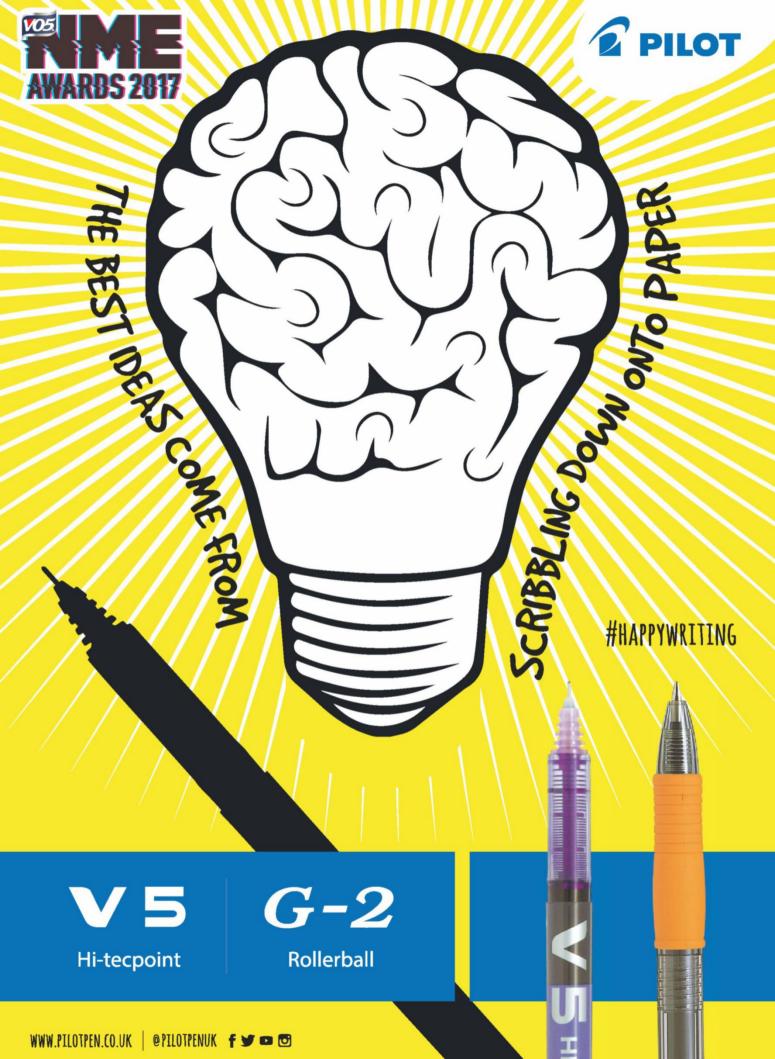

Gary Lineker voiced their anger, while members of the public brandished ingenious signs, including one (mis)quoting grime artist JME ("Act like a wasteman / That's just May").

Holman told NME: "The protest gave us the opportunity to sisters across the pond. Just can't. It was inspirational."

The spirit of resistance was mirrored in the US, too: Rage Against The Machine's Tom Morello joined Public Enemy's Chuck D at an LAX airport protest, while the Screen Actors Guild Awards was defined by pointedly political speeches. Best of all was Stranger Things that, "We will get past the lies,

AGENDA

Siri-ously So, the concept for iBoy is fairly out there...

Boy gets an iPhone lodged in his brain, becomes a superhero. Here's actor Bill Milner on iBoy, the weirdest new Netflix film

YOU AND YOUR smartphone are probably on close terms. But that's nothing compared to iBoy - the new Netflix movie starring Bill Milner and Game Of Thrones star Maisie Williams. Based on the 2010 novel by Kevin Brooks, it tells the tale of Tom (Milner), a London schoolboy who's shot after finding attackers sexually assaulting his friend Lucy (Williams). Pieces of a shattered iPhone get lodged in his brain and give him a sort of Apple upgrade, allowing him to intercept messages and phone calls. We had a chat with Bill to talk tech and terror.

"There are some quite crazy and ridiculous elements to the story, but then it is grounded in reality. I think that's what the audience will like - they might see their own stories. What I love about it isn't necessarily the sci-fi, it's the characters and how they relate."

We heard you were involved with writing the script...

"Yeah, [director] Adam Randall was really interested in the cast's opinions. He wanted younger voices in there. Maisie spoke a lot about our approach to the sexual assault scene - we needed to use the word 'rape', rather than step around it. There were a few drafts of the script that said 'attack', which does a disservice to people that have been through that."

Maisie Williams is, notoriously, cool as fk. Was she a right laugh during filming?

"She's one of my best mates now! I was staying with my brother in Hackney and she was in an Airbnb round the corner. Living and filming in Hackney was such fun - there are great pubs everywhere. Maisie got recognised quite a lot when we went out, but she just takes it in her stride."

Do you see iBoy as a Black Mirror-style comment on our relationship with technology?

"People have compared it to Black Mirror, but they're cautionary tales, whereas our film embraces technology and sees it in a positive light. If there's a cautionary tale in iBoy, it's that if you have power, you have to go after what you want, but you shouldn't jeopardise your friendships."

Pop heroes Pet Shop Boys will pick up the Godlike Genius Award at the VO5 NME Awards 2017

WITH JUST TWO WEEKS until the big event, we can confirm that Pet Shop Boys are the recipients of the Godlike Genius Award at the VO5 NME Awards 2017.

The synthpop heroes will collect the trophy at the ceremony, which takes place at London's O2 Academy Brixton on February 15. Previous Godlike Genius recipients include U2, Manic Street Preachers, Blondie and last year's winners Coldplay.

The award recognises and rewards their hugely successful and influential career, during which they've consistently produced some of the most ambitious, intelligent and bold pop music around.

"We're really happy to win NME's Godlike Genius Award and we're looking forward to playing at the awards show," said Pet Shop Boys.

Since meeting in an electronics shop in Chelsea in 1981, Neil Tennant and Chris Lowe have released 13 Top 10 studio albums and 22 Top 10 singles, including 'West End Girls', 'Always On My Mind' and 'Go West'. They've collaborated with and influenced an array of music's biggest stars, such as David Bowie, Madonna, Lady Gaga and Daft Punk.

The band will close the ceremony with a performance including tracks from throughout their 36-year career.

They join previously announced performers Bastille, Dua Lipa and Wiley. The latter will receive the Outstanding Contribution To Music Award at the event.

The VO5 NME Awards 2017 will be hosted by BBC Radio 1 DJ Huw Stephens. Get your tickets and follow all the action over at NME.com/awards.

Turn it up! Why soul-shakingly loud gigs rule

THE DRUMMER IN shoegaze legends and notoriously noisy fkers My Bloody Valentine recently - and quaintly - wrote a letter to his local newspaper. Colm Ó Cíosóig reached out to The Irish Times and got into a right huff about a "new reality that is castrating culture". His issue was with his local mega-venue, Dublin's 3Arena, and what he saw as a reluctance there to pump up the volume, resulting in some gigs that were quieter than he'd have liked. Ó Cíosóig had seen Neil Young and Black Sabbath there and at both gigs heard only a mew when he'd expected a roar.

See, when it comes to all things loud, Ó Cíosóig knows his stuff. My Bloody Valentine have been around since the mid-1980s and in the business of stunning crowds with their towering fortress of sound ever since. When I saw them at All Tomorrow's Parties in 2009, they handed out earplugs before embarking on their brutal, soul-quaking onslaught. "When upfront at a gig you are supposed to feel the drums and bass rattle your bones, and the music should fill your head to the extent that it can bring you to an ecstatic place," wrote Ó Cíosóig.

As someone who's had some of the most powerful experiences of my life not far from a megalithic speaker stack, I'm inclined to agree. Often, feeling a gig can be just as powerful as watching it; the rumble in your head, the shuddering in your stomach, the small but real chance that you may throw up into your pint glass. It doesn't happen all the time, but when it does, it's an intoxicating, almost meditative thing.

as watching it"

body-shaking shows, from stoner metallers Sleep, experimental rockers Swans and proto-grunge gods Melvins, who all turned it up to 11 and got me one step closer to enlightenment via volume. In the coming year, I'm expecting the same from drone 'n' doom dons Sunn O))) and rock icons Deep Purple - the band who once knocked three fans unconscious with sheer noisiness.

Which brings us neatly to the not-unimportant matter of health and safety. I might be in love with loudness, but it's as dangerous as it is compelling. The Guinness Book Of Records no longer has a record for loudest band, thanks to fears of promoting damage to people's hearing. In fact, My Bloody Valentine have been victims of their own volume; guitarist and vocalist Bilinda Butcher once burst an eardrum and frontman Kevin Shields suffers from tinnitus, like roughly 10 per cent of the British public -Liam and Noel Gallagher included. Incurable and a massive pain in the arse, tinnitus should be avoided.

Sunn O))) are

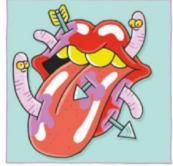

loud and proud

There's currently no government legislation about noise limits at gigs, but there will be warnings dotted around a venue if it's going to be a belter. So invest in some decent earplugs - you can still feel the decibels work their way through you with them in - and don't go to loud gigs every night of the week. Enjoy loudness in moderation and it'll make it even more special.

HE 'ELTON JOHN CALL'
has, for a long time now, been as sure a sign as you can get that an up-andcoming singer is doing better than OK. And Rag'n'Bone Man – AKA Rory Graham – has just had his.

"It was an unknown number," he remembers. "And I don't like answering unknown numbers. But all the people I was with in my manager's office were like, 'Nah, answer it'. I answered and he's like, 'Dahhhling, it's Elton!' I just went, 'Fking hell.' He just goes, 'Fking love you, I think you're brilliant.' He'd just rung to say how good he thought I was and how he loved my material. It was great!"

The song that piqued Elton's attention - and a lot of other people's too - was, of course, 'Human', Graham's bluesy, smoky lead single from his forthcoming major label debut. It's one of those songs that has, for reasons that neither its creator nor anyone else can quite ascertain, taken on a life of its own. Intended as "a little ramp to the record", it's exploded out of all proportion since its July 2016 release: omnipresent and rising as far as Number Two in the Christmas chart, it was even performed on The X Factor by Emily Middlemas ("I thought she sang it quite well, to be honest," says Graham), after which Simon Cowell declared, "No one has heard this song, but it's going to be a huge hit."

Note to Cowell: 'Human' had been in the charts for a long time prior to his prediction. Not only that, but it had been doing unbelievably well all over the world – particularly in Europe, where it reached Number One in 10 countries. In Germany, it remained on top of the charts for over three months, making Graham one of the most recognisable British faces there right now.

Well. Sort of.

"We were in Hamburg," he smiles, beginning a story that he knows is a good one, "and the night before a show, one of the guys was like, 'We should go to the Christmas market on the Reeperbahn.' So we all went and it was fking brilliant. I'd noticed people, like, looking at me a little bit more and I was like, 'Was this a good idea?' Then this one guy came up with his girlfriend. He said, 'Excuse me, but you look like Rory Graham.' I was like, 'Oh right, yeah.' He got a picture of me up on his phone and showed it to me. He was like, 'You look like him!' And I was like, 'Yeah, I do a bit, don't I?' then walked off and swiftly made my way out of there.

Nine things you probably didn't know about Rag'n' Bone Man

Because there's more to him than 'Human'

1 He's named after a British sitcom

Yep, it's Steptoe And Son, about a father-and-son rag-and-bone business.

2 He was once best known for being an MC You used to find Rory Graham at illegal raves or on his Rag 'N' Bonez crew's own pirate radio station.

3 His tattoos are all related to music
The words 'Funk' and 'Soul' on his knuckles;
The Blues Brothers on his arms.

4 A night at his local helped make him a star

Aged 21, his dad encouraged him to try an open mic night, and a stranger told him he should sing more.

5 His big break came after singing on the bog His girlfriend sent promoters recordings of him practising covers in the loo, leading to a support slot with Joan Armatrading.

6 Bastille's producer helped shape his current sound He teamed up with Mark Crew, who's worked on Bastille's two albums to date, in 2014. "Then we had security going to the airport," he continues, "with people giving me high fives through security and stuff. I don't mind being recognised, as long as people are nice. I do like meeting people, it's just that some people are a bit disrespectful... Sometimes it's like, I'm having a roast dinner and someone's taking a picture of me. I don't mind taking pictures, but just ask, otherwise it's a bit weird. People are obsessed by pictures these days. They just want to say they met someone, have the evidence."

This is true, but the fact is Rory Graham is going to have to get used to many more fans claiming their piece of 'evidence' over the coming months. Following on from the runaway success of 'Human', he's been named the winner of the BRITs Critics' Choice Award (previous winners including... oh, you know), beating off competition from Anne-Marie and Dua Lipa. It came as a surprise to him. "When I was first nominated," he says, "I thought, 'Oh, they've just put me in there because they had to put someone in that's a bit more left-field.' I did convince myself that I wasn't going to win."

raham says he doesn't really care about being famous. "In fact, I don't really want it. If I could erase that side of it, then that'd be cool, but... I think you can't concern yourself with the fame thing, or with what people say about you, because there's a lot of dkheads in the world and unfortunately social media has given those dkheads voices. I just block everybody now. I've got a bit of a temper and sometimes I'll just bite, so I've had to learn to be like, 'OK, instead of that I'll just fking block you straightaway. I don't want to know your bks'."

While his success may seem to have come overnight, it's the culmination of seven or eight years of hard work – and it has its roots in the UK's underground hip-hop scene.

Now 32, Rory Graham was born in Uckfield, a small town in East Sussex. From the age of about 16, he wanted to be a jungle DJ or MC and put on parties in his local area "just with mates and stuff. We'd put on a night in the local pub, then get kicked out." In 2008, he moved 18 miles up the road to Brighton and immersed himself in the then-vibrant hip-hop and open mic scene. "At the start it would kind of been more about freestyling," he says. "But then I started to sing over the beats. And then came a realisation that maybe I was alright at rapping, and people seemed to enjoy it, but when I sung it was a real difference. Just the reaction of people, I was like, 'I think I should do that, 'cause it feels better.'

He's being modest here. The voice that characterises Rag'n'Bone Man's music is truly a showstopper, sounding like it's emanating from someone who grew up in the Deep South of 1950s America rather than a rainy British seaside town. Surely he must have known it was something special? "Well, I realised it was in tune," he shrugs. "I realised it wasn't bad, but I didn't realise that it was distinctive or that there was anything particularly different about it. It was when old dudes would come up to me at jam nights and be like, 'I've been playing for 40 years and I have to say your voice is fking incredible' and stuff like that. Then I'd be like, 'Well, if they're saying it, there must be some sort of truth to it."

Having found his voice, Rag'n'Bone Man initially struggled to fit into the scenes around him, so different was what he was doing. But quickly the UK hip-hop community, he says, "really embraced me. Everybody got on board and I gained a really cool fanbase through that. I was able to do festivals and bigger shows and stuff, even when I'd only put out a few little projects. It was pretty cool, really."

e self-released a couple of records, but soon "felt limited" by the constraints of both hip-hop and blues, and started looking for ways to develop his songwriting. Fortunately for him, he bumped into an old schoolfriend from Uckfield, Mark Crew, who'd been busy producing Bastille. Together, they developed the songs that would make up 2014's 'Wolves' EP. The resulting publishing deal allowed him to 'give up the day job' - he used to work as a carer for people with Asperger's and Down's syndromes - and ultimately started to attract the attention of major labels. "I was a little bit scared of all that at first," he notes, "'cause I didn't really have any knowledge of the music industry above ground. On a grassroots level, you do everything yourself and you have 100 per cent control. So it was like, if these big guys are interested in me, what do they want out of me?" He signed with Columbia, feeling they were happy with him the way he was, but he's still wary of other major labels. "They want to make vou the next someone else." he continues. "And I've never heard that about myself, which is nice. It's never been 'You're the next such and such' because they can't figure it out. They can't fit me in a box, which is good. I'm not really box-sized, am I?"

The next step for Rag'n'Bone Man is to get the album out in the next couple of weeks. It's also called 'Human', but anyone expecting it to be just The Big Single and 10 more songs that are a lot like The Big Single will be disappointed. It's the opposite: a super-eclectic selection of songs, of which "50 per cent was written in the last year, and then stuff that I couldn't let go of. Like, there's a song from 'Wolves' called 'Life In Her Yet' which I wrote in, like, 2013. I didn't feel like enough people had heard it, so I felt it had a place on the album.

"There are really three parts to the album and there's, like, quite a lot of hip-hop on there. I guess it is a worry that people who love 'Human' might think they're buying the album and that's a blueprint for it, but it's definitely not. Hopefully they'll be pleasantly surprised."

He is, he notes, slightly daunted by the fact that he can't see a gap in his schedule until 2018. But Rory Graham is also lucky to have a great support network of people around him: from his girlfriend of eight years ("She doesn't ring me up and go, 'Oh, this is really hard.' She just gets on with it") to the crew that he used to - and when he can, still does - do shows with all over Brighton at all those open mic nights. He knows exactly what he wants to do, and who he is, and who he wants to be. And that's something that no troll can spoil for him – something that's much, much more important than any award that anyone can give him.

success stories include new kits based on Minecraft, The Beatles' Yellow Submarine and the NASA Mars Curiosity Rover – with working suspension – which was designed and suggested by a NASA mechanical engineer called Stephen Pakbaz. "If this is what it means to be a geek," he told 2014's A Lego Brickumentary, "I'm definitely OK with that because it's the most fun I've ever had."

hy is Lego's crossgenerational appeal so strong? According to Jon Sutton, editor of The Psychologist, it's because it "represents both order and chaos. You can follow the instructions step by step, or you can go off-piste and create pretty much anything you can imagine." Sutton reckons the choice of Batman – "perhaps the most subversive character they could have picked" – is "the epitome" of that side of Lego.

The key weapon in The Lego Group's arsenal, though, is its squeaky clean reputation – and it's quick to maintain it. In November 2016 a Reading-based father called Bob Jones questioned a Lego promotion with the Daily Mail in a Facebook post that went viral. He recalls: "I had to say 'no' to my son when he looked at the front page of the Daily Mail and said, 'It says there's free Lego – can I get it?" His Facebook post criticised the partnership with a paper whose headlines, he said, "do nothing but create distrust of foreigners, blame

Yet Lego remains undented and earlier this week was named the world's most powerful brand (above greats like Disney, Apple and Visa) by the global valuation consultancy Brand Finance. Its marketing and communications director Robert Haigh highlights gender neutrality, a long pedigree and customer loyalty as crucial factors in the ranking - but it's the company's new direction that's really making waves right now. Lego is repositioning itself as a "broader entertainment business", says Haigh, which means we can expect multiple feature-length films in the wake of September's The Lego Ninjago Movie and 2019's The Lego Movie Sequel. It means that Lego could conceivably be the new Pixar.

The big question, though, is whether Lego's ever-growing bubble might burst one day. "It could," Haigh concedes. "But the picture is certainly very rosy in the next few years." The bricks aren't going anywhere. Best watch your step.

Dark therapy

Sampha Sisay takes a break from helping out Drake, Solange and Frank Ocean to create a world all of his own

SAMPHA SISAY IS a huge talent. That's a fact acknowledged by Drake, Solange and Frank Ocean, all of whom have signed up the 27-year-old to help them with production and vocals over the past few years.
In fact, the young man from Morden in south London has been so busy contributing to the groundbreaking R&B albums of others that he's been delayed in releasing his own.

Is 'Process' worth the three-and-a-half-year wait since his last EP? Yes – absolutely. It's a finely crafted and devastating take on the loss of his mother to cancer, as well as his inner turmoil at how success has dragged him away from his roots. The 'process' of the title refers to that of grieving as much as it does making music. Not that there's much distinction shown in these 10 therapeutic songs about love, remorse and ambition. '(No One Knows Me) Like The Piano' is the saddest of the lot – a stripped-back eulogy to his mother, played on a piano as beaten up and full of feeling as any Tom Waits ever sat down at.

Elsewhere, there are plenty of masterful production touches. The timeless, lurching groove of 'Timmy's Prayer', for example, or the lush orchestration and crisp drum break of 'Blood On Me' – an emotional opus to rival Massive Attack's 'Unfinished Sympathy'. More often the music is subtle, however. It's simply an accompaniment to Sampha's main instrument: his voice. So that when he croons to his departed mother, "In my chest you knew me best / You know I'll be back home" on '...Like The Piano', there's not a heartstring that remains unplucked.

'Process' might not be as bold or as inventive or as life-changing as some of the other records Sampha's had a hand in during his career, but it does have a quiet, dignified impact that suits its maker. He hasn't stepped out of his shadowy, background world; instead, he's invited us to join him there. Jonny Ensall

Ever-reliable Mancunians serve up another album that's as warming as the morning's fourth whisky

ELBOW
Little Fictions

IT'S UNFORTUNATE that the cover art for Elbow's seventh album reflects the cartoonish sci-fi aesthetic of 2016 video game No Man's Sky, a near-endless virtual universe of 18 quintillion planets that many gamers found to be a repetitive and dreary façade of stratospheric enormity. Some feel the same way about Elbow and, lacking any glorious unifying anthems like 'One Day Like This' and, um, all of Elbow's other glorious unifying anthems, they won't find anything to change their minds in 'Little Fictions'. A stylistic handbrake turn this is not; they're still Doves with narcolepsy.

There's much to love, though, for those who find Elbow's lethargic northern atmospherics as warm and comforting as the morning's fourth whisky. Marking a return to communal writing around an open fire in Scotland, 'Little Fictions' is a 13-tog duvet of a record, freed from

Guy Garvey's relationship upheavals that informed 2014's 'The Take Off And Landing Of Everything' and his 2015 solo album 'Courting The Squall', and out to find some joy and romance in a darkening world.

It's there in the uplifting gospel and Afrobeat splashes, in the somnolent cowbell rave of 'Gentle Storm' and in the gorgeous Velvet Underground lollops of 'All Disco' and 'Kindling', both the sound of 'Venus In Furs' high on Radox. And it's there in first single 'Magnificent (She Says)', a stirring, string-swaddled vision of a young girl playing happily on a beach, a portrait of parental pride and childhood hope in the face of Hurricane Boris.

Not that 'Little Fictions' completely glosses over the terrors and challenges of 2017, like ramming a pillow over your ears at a Trump press conference. The electronic hula of 'K2' has Garvey sing-rapping about Britain's blind plunge towards an increasingly st-brown Brexit "full of blood, snot and teeth and the glory of no one". He attacks the partisan press and "the villains at the tiller" who "gambled the farm on a headline" and considers going to live in a caravan in the Andes. That this, and the routine desperation of a spluttering relationship described in a whirlwind of backward violins on the eight-minute title track, sound as reassuring as a slightly experimental shipping forecast will merely maintain Elbow's standing as the musical prescription tranquilliser you're either deeply addicted to or find too mild for your narcotic tastes.

If you're chasing the initial buzz, 'Little Fictions' is quite a hit. Mark Beaumont

An award-winning, offbeat German comedy - complete with freaky sex scene and a huge heart

TONI ERDMANN

15 Peter Simonischek, Sandra Hüller, Michael Wittenborn

IF THERE'S A THIN LINE between comedy and sadness. this subtitled film from German director Maren Ade inches along it with cool self-confidence. Toni Erdmann is a strange. sometimes hilarious and ultimately very moving comedydrama that deservedly won the top prize at last year's European Film Awards.

After early scenes introducing us to his unusual sense of humour, we follow prank-loving German piano teacher Winfried (Peter Simonischek) to Bucharest, where he plans to surprise his high-flying daughter Ines (Sandra Hüller). Unfortunately, she's horribly distracted with wooing a potential new client called Henneberg (Michael Wittenborn), so any father-daughter bonding takes a backseat.

Winfried seemingly leaves Bucharest feeling dejected and concerned for his overworked and isolated daughter, who appears to be prone to depression. Yet a couple of days later, he reappears unexpectedly while Ines is dining at a fancy restaurant with friends, having disguised himself with a tatty wig and some terrible false teeth.

At this point, Ade's film becomes increasingly surreal. Presenting himself as "Toni Erdmann", Henneberg's eccentric supposed life coach, Winfried keeps inserting himself into Ines' personal and professional interactions. Her responses to his clumsy intrusions are exquisitely written and beautifully performed.

Desperate not to embarrass true identity, Ines is clearly exasperated, but she's too kind and perhaps too scared to tell her father to drop the act. At times, she's even amused by his silly but well-meaning antics. A scene in which Toni corners Ines into belting out Whitney Houston's 'The Greatest Love Of All' for a room of strangers is a masterclass in social awkwardness.

Toni Erdmann isn't selfindulgent, but it definitely feels long. Its offbeat comedy unfolds over 162 minutes, which includes an extended sequence set at an awkward naked party and an even freakier sex scene that almost feels like something from a Hollywood gross-out movie. But even in its weirdest interludes, Ade's film never loses focus. At its heart, Toni Erdmann is a touching exploration of the way parental love can be comforting even when we think

JOHN WICK BECAME AN immediate action classic when it was released in 2015. With Keanu Reeves playing a retired hitman who picks up his guns once more to avenge the killing of the only thing he loved – his dog – it was filled with thrilling gunfights, detestable villains and cracking one-liners. Now the man, the myth, the legend is back for John Wick: Chapter Two.

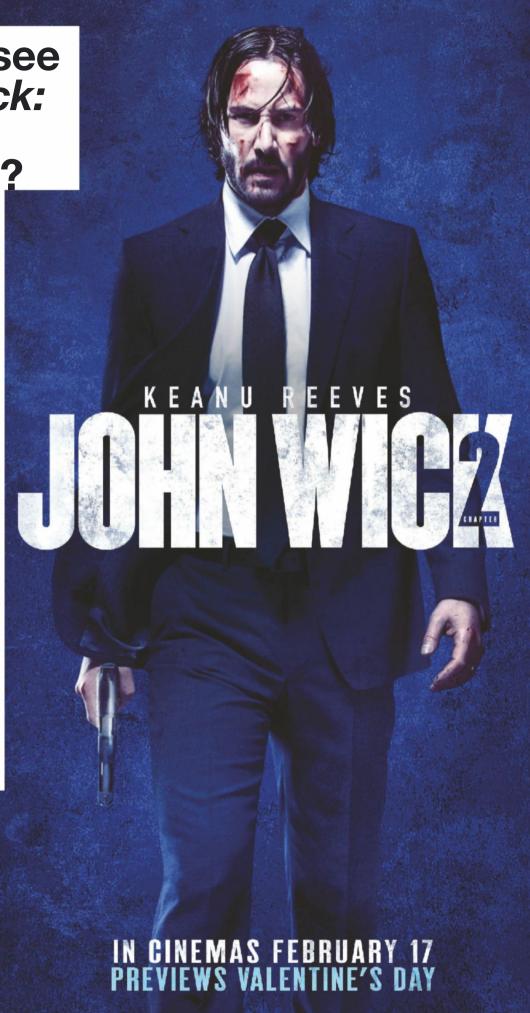

One of the most anticipated sequels of the year, John Wick: Chapter Two transports John to Rome, where he has to use all his skills to assist a former associate who's attempting to take control of a mysterious international assassins guild. John will face his deadliest enemies yet as he aids his old cohort. Expect even more exciting examples of 'gun-fu' – that's part-gunfight, part-martial art – than we saw in the first movie.

Joining Keanu Reeves in the new movie are his old Matrix co-star Laurence Fishburne, Academy Award winner Common and Ruby Rose (Orange Is The New Black). Ian McShane also returns as the scene-stealing Winston. John Wick: Chapter Two is a bigger, slicker, even more adrenalised sequel in which only one thing is certain: not everyone will make it out alive.

Can't wait to see it? Good news: you could nab a place at a special preview screening ahead of its release on Feb 17.

How do I claim tickets?

John Wick: Chapter Two blasts into cinemas on Feb 17, but lucky NME readers have the chance to see it first and for free at special preview screenings across the country on Feb 10 (London only) and Feb 16. To claim free preview tickets, visit showfilmfirst.com and enter the code 690095 for London, or 325920 for Glasgow and Birmingham.

He's the latest Marvel superhero to get his own TV series, but who is Legion and how does he stack up against his fellow capes?

LEGION

FOX, 9pm, February 9 Dan Stevens, Rachel Keller MARVEL COMICS MUTANTS

Dan Stevens as David 💳 Haller/Legion

THE USP

In the comics, Legion is a mutant whose powers also include all the symptoms of schizophrenia and dissociative identity disorder - the difference being that he also has all the strengths and abilities of his additional personalities. This internal struggle plays havoc with the man's mind and Legion's sanity - or lack thereof - is a major theme in the series. In this respect, his nearest mutant neighbour is probably the fourthwall-breaking Deadpool, who operates on a different plane of reality to the world around him.

SEXINESS

Marvel Comics' big and small screen adaptations aren't exactly famed for the unattractiveness of their cast - sometimes there'll be a group of people onscreen where Chris Hemsworth (y'know, Thor) is, like, the third best-looking. Insanity. Dan Stevens (who plays Legion) is more in the 'James McAvoy as Charles Xavier/Professor X' camp than the 'Hugh Jackman as Wolverine' one, in that he looks like a handsome dude rather than a demigod carved out of God's own bicep - but come on, he's not doing badly. He's about to be the Beast to Emma Watson's Belle in the live-action Beauty And The Beast movie, and models for Armani in his spare time.

ABSURDITY

Fargo showrunner Noah Hawley is in charge of Legion and he's brought a hallucinatory, beautifully shot ridiculousness to it, with Bollywood-esque song and dance sequences, and tables being overturned in bullet time. It's appropriate for the character, whose multiple personalities include pirates, dinosaurs, centaurs and all kinds of preposterousness. If you think Legion sounds like a silly character, though, dig through Marvel's archives and you'll find plenty where that came from, including Bird-Brain, Doorman and The Hypno-Hustler.

POWER

Legion is one of the most powerful mutants in the universe and, pleasingly, can be described as such (due to boring licensing issues between Marvel and 20th Century Fox, the word 'mutant' isn't used in any of the Marvel Cinematic Universe or I Marvel's TV shows – only the X-Men films and now Legion). He's the secret son of Professor X and the manifold nature of his powers means that, cumulatively, he could wallop any other X-Person. It's the bigger ones, the otherworldly things, the Thanoses and Galactuses of the galaxy, who could put up more of a fight.

ER, MANY-NESS (?)

Legion gets his name from sort of being loads of people – it's a Bible reference, from a demon telling Jesus, "My name is Legion, for we are many." The Marvel character with the next best claim to being loads of people is Spider-Man, due to his involvement in The Clone Saga in the comics (and being played by three different actors in 10 years in the films). The Clone Saga was a longrunning event in which it was revealed (but later shown to be a lie) that the Spider-Man we all knew and loved was just one of loads of Spider-clones, some of whom had weird things going on, like eight limbs. It was, um, crap though, while Legion looks anything but, so there's that.

Billie Marten

Teenager writing dark, smart songs

BILLIE MARTEN IS JUST like every other A-level student with a job on the side. But balancing coursework and earning a few quid in the local Italian is one thing; very few of us had to juggle school with touring an album.

Marten, named on the BBC Music Sound Of 2016 list, released her subtly experimental, quietly stunning debut 'Writing Of Blues And Yellows' back in September. While she may not mention it to mates — "I never, ever talk about my music in school" — it's a record worth shouting about, giving nods to Laura Marling, SOAK and '70s singer-songwriter Nick Drake.

Right now the teenager is less worried about ticket sales, more hoping she can keep up with English, French and Art while on the road, with a UK tour under her belt and US shows plotted for later this year.

Despite only being 17, she's already something of a veteran. Things got going from an unlikely source: her mum uploaded videos of Marten singing covers to YouTube to show to her grandparents in France. A couple of years later, she recorded a session for a local TV station and has been writing ever since. She flippantly says the songs on her debut are either awful ones she wrote years ago or "crap" she penned at the last minute to "shove on there" and fill the gaps.

"Don't get me wrong, a lot of time and tears went into [the album]," she says. "But it isn't perfection. If I was waiting for that, it would never have come out. I'm just aware of my weaknesses and want to carry on so I can make another one, and another one. I just know I need to stay true to what I want to do and not fit in with other people's perceptions."

Marten's songwriting is sophisticated beyond her years — '...Blues And Yellows' is filled with candid self-analysis and references to mental health. "I have a lot of fake characters I like to bring out in certain situations, as we all do. No one would describe me as the happiest person in the world, but I'm not a misery. I'm just... there. Sad songs are the ones I connect with best."

If Marten sounds as if she doesn't quite understand her appeal, plenty of others do – video views total close to two million. "I guess those numbers do mean something," she says. "But not to me. It's not like I check them every day. It's mad that so many people I don't know listen to my music." Andy Welch

Parklife Festival is bringing Frank Ocean and The 1975 to Manchester's Heaton Park this summer

UNTIL LAST WEEK, IT looked like Frank Ocean's only UK date in 2017 would be London's Lovebox in July. But Manchester's Parklife Festival has just pipped them to the post by announcing the reclusive superstar as one of its headliners in June. It'll be the first time in four years that the cult R&B star has played in the UK.

Last time Frank was here, he was touring his debut album, 2012's lauded 'Channel Orange', but this time round he'll have three albums of material to choose from. In August last year, he made good on four years of hype by releasing two albums in one go: an overlooked visual album called 'Endless' and the real deal, 'Blonde', which went to Number One in the UK, the USA and several other countries around the world. Ocean hasn't played live since 2014, so it remains a mystery how he'll adapt these two introspective, meandering new albums for festivals, but one thing's for sure: he'll be attracting huge crowds.

Also drawing big audiences will be the festival's other headliners, The 1975. These local boys dominated last year's festival circuit with their overblown, beautifully staged and funny sets, which were mostly made up of songs from their overblown, beautiful and funny album 'I Like It When You Sleep, For You Are So Beautiful Yet So Unaware Of It'.

Elsewhere, festivalgoers can look forward to sets from Skepta's crew Boy Better Know, Californian R&B man Anderson .Paak, Swedish pop star Zara Larsson and the pop-leaning indie trio Two Door Cinema Club.

AN SJM CONCERTS AND DF CONCERTS PRESENTATION BY ARRANGEMENT WITH ITB, DECKSTAR AND CARDIFF GIANT

THE FIRST SONG I REMEMBER HEARING

DEACON BLUEReal Gone Kid

"My mam always had the radio on when I was a kid, so '80s music is just in my soul. I was two years old, I could barely string a sentence together and a song was on the radio. My mam and dad were going, 'Who sings this?' Out of nowhere, two-year-old me in the back of the car said, 'Deacon Blue, Real Gone Kid.' They looked at us like, 'What the hell?!'"

THE SONG I CAN NO LONGER LISTEN TO

Ghetto Gospel

"I was on a lads' holiday with me mates when I was 16 in Magaluf and it came on by the pool twice in a row. Then I went up to me room and the room to the right played it. Then it finished and then the room to the left played it and then the room across the corridor played it."

THE FIRST SONG I FELL IN LOVE WITH

RICK ASTLEY

Never Gonna Give You Up

"It's gonna be something rubbish... I absolutely loved Rick Astley. I didn't buy it, my mum and dad had it, but I used to walk around with a Rick Astley tape and make them put it on all the time. I just thought he was great."

THE FIRST GIG I WENT TO

ARCTIC MONKEYS
The Red Rooms,
Newcastle

"It was £2 a ticket. It was when they still had the husky lad as the bassist, Andy. I got him and Alex Turner to sign my shirt. I was, like, proper fangirling over them. I got the Metro home and I remember being so buzzing that I went in my mam's room and told her how amazing it was."

THE FIRST ALBUM I BOUGHT PJ & DUNCAN

Psyche

"Just to be a northern stereotype it was the first album by PJ & Duncan [Ant & Dec], 'Psyche'. 'Let's Get Ready To Rhumble' was my favourite song, obviously. And they taught us about paintball safety on Byker Grove, too."

THE SONG THAT MAKES ME DANCE BILLY JOEL

We Didn't Start The Fire

"There isn't actually a dance to it. You just march on the spot and you point when somebody says something. Also 'St Elmo's Fire (Man In Motion)' by John Parr, but I don't want to dance; I just want to stand up and point with both hands in the air."

MY WARM-UP TRACK

DAN LE SAC VS SCROOBIUS PIP Letter From God To Man

THE SONG I WANT PLAYED AT MY FUNERAL
